of the Bulgies, exhibited hostility of the Impressioned to produce is inary, that we almost the sight of the fact, that the noble exertions which are now rewarded in so extraordinary a manner, arose out of permission granted to the Generals to march on their own responsibility to Cabul, and not from any steady determination of purpose. In the exhibition of this spectacle, we are happy to forget that the Army of Reserve, which has been kept together to receive the returning soldiers, has cost the state from six to eight lakhs of Rupees a month. We will not open the year ungraciously by begrudging the cost of this gathering, when we remember the gratification it must afford to those on whom this honor is bestowed, or the effect which the assemblage of such an army on such an occasion may produce on all those who have been anticipating the extinction of our rule.

But what is that procession crossing the Bridge, with all the "pomp and pride and circumstance of war," and what objects are those covered with the embroidered trappings of the Governor General's State Elephant? They are the Heavens Gates of Somnath, "the trophies of our victory over the Afghans." In that vast assemblage of forty thousand troops, there is not one minister of our holy religion; but what matters it!—There are the holy sandal wood gates, which once adorned a heathen temple, and which, after the lapse of eight centuries of improvement, a Christian Governor General is about to restore to it, with more than heathen parade.

THE COMPLETION OF THE REGIMENTS.—The Governor General has at length filled up the Regiments which suffered so severely during the calamitous retreat from Cabul; and in a mode which is likely to create universal dissatisfaction through the army. The principle of regimental promotion has now been set aside, for the first time, and the vacancies have been supplied for the most part from other Regiments. Of those who had a claim to these steps a great number have thus been disappointed while those whom it is intended to serve, have in many instances found their prospects deteriorated by the change. At the same time officers, who have no personal interest in these mutations, are dimmed by the allegation of the prescriptive rule on which they have hitherto been accustomed to look for their advancement. They naturally argue, that if the rule has been broken through in one instance, its integrity is gone, and that what is an innovation to-day, will be a precedent to-morrow. If when a Regiment has been deprived of three-fourths of its officers by one calamity, the vacant steps are to be distributed among other corps, what is to prevent a repetition of this arrangement when half the officers of any Regiment have been annihilated by any other calamity? They reason justly, that the rule of promotion by seniority is the vital principle of the army; that it cannot be violated without depriving the service of its cornucopia and vested rights, and that this rule has been held sacred even in extreme cases, of the same character with that which has now occurred. To instance only one of many instances. The 37th Madras Regiment lost half its officers in the Colofonda, not three years ago, on her way to China, yet the vacancies were filled up in the Regiment, and those who survived enjoyed all the benefits of the steps, which had been created by those who perished.

A right which is held in so sacred a light, ought not to have been infringed, except upon the strongest and most palpable necessity. And what necessity was there for violating it in the present instance? None whatever. The only plea which can be offered is, that some inconvenience might possibly have arisen, if officers of extreme youth and great inexperience had been pushed on towards the head of a Regiment; that is to say, if four young men had risen earlier than usual to the rank of Major, and acquired the chance of commanding the corps. Yet even this disadvantage might have been obviated, by placing Lieutenant Colonels in command of the Regiments. But it is much to be doubted, whether the acquisition of such a command by men in the vigor of manhood would have been half so great a disadvantage as that to which the army is constantly exposed, by the responsibility of a Regiment being placed in the hands of dotards, in the last stage of mental decrepitude. On the contrary, it might turn out to be a solid advantage to have a young and active man in command of a corps. In the Queen's Service, men are constantly rising, by the principle of purchase, to the head of Regiments, while yet the fire of youth is in them. There is therefore no reasonable ground, even upon the score of inconvenience, for thus departing from prescription, and invading the privileges of the army. The officers enter the service with the clear understanding, that every step occasioned by the calamities of war or of climate, belongs to those who survive; and it is no argument for breaking this rule, that the vacancies have been numerous, and the good fortune of the survivors unusual. When men are required to submit to the deterioration of their prospects by the inactivity of a season of peace, it is unjust to deprive them of any incidental advantages which may arise from a season of active service. The army has undoubtedly been wronged by the present arrangement; and as neither Government nor the public interests are any the better for it, we think it equitable every Regiment, individually, to transmit a respectful petition to the Court of Directors and to the Board of Control, praying that the order may be reconsidered, and that the principle which has been so long the acknowledged rule of promotion, may be upheld.

THE SALE LAW, FOR THE THIRD AND LAST TIME.—A friend, on whose judgment in all matters connected with the Revenue laws, we place great reliance, has favoured us with some observations on the two articles, which have appeared during the past month in this journal, relative to the working of the new Sale Law. We have carefully gone over the argument, and frankly confess, that the question wears a different aspect in the light in which he has placed it. It is not clear however that the Act intended, that the days fixed for the sale of land for arrears of past years, or for arrears due on account of estates other than that to be sold, should correspond with the days fixed by the Board for sales on account of the current year. Reasoning from the analogy of circumstances, any man would be justified in supposing, that the rules which applied to the one were not intended to apply to the other; and that the day of sale in the one case was to be fixed by the Board and remain unaltered, and in the other to be fixed by the Commissioner and the Collector, with no other principle of fixity, than that fifteen clear days must intervene between the publication of the Notification and the day of sale. Upon this supposition we were led to the opinion that if the Notification, in the latter case, did not happen to have been published fifteen clear days before the day which had been fixed for the sale, the sale itself might be postponed till the time had expired. We do not think it was the intention of the Legislature, that sales for arrears which were to be peremptory without any Notification to the landholders, and sales which were conditional on the publication of notices for the information of the defaulting landlord, should follow the same rule of time and precision.

Supposing therefore, that the days for the sale of estates in arrears for the revenue of the preceding year may be fixed by the Collector and Commissioner, the law may, without any violence, be taken to mean, that if the fifteen clear days of Notification have not expired when the day arrives, the sale may be put off till that period has elapsed; but it is to be remembered that no payment made by the defaulter after sunset of the day preceding the day which may thus have been fixed in the Notification, will stop the sale of his estate. And as it was evidently the intention of the law, that notice of the intended sale should reach the defaulter fifteen clear days before his lands were sold by auction, it is necessary that this intention should not be defeated by any construction of it. Hence it appears advisable to issue a fresh advertisement, in order that a sufficiently long intimation may be given to him of his danger. Thus, supposing that the day fixed for the sale be 31st of January next; and that the Notification be not affixed at the Cutchery of the landholder before the 20th of that month, although the Collector might possibly, under a fair construction of the law, postpone the sale to the 5th of the next month, yet he could not postpone the period for the payment of the arrears by the Zemindar; and unless that sum was paid on the evening of the 20th, that is to say, within nine days after the Notification had been made known to the defaulter, his estate must be sold. This course would appear to be contrary to the equitable provision of the law, and in such a case, we think it would be very reasonable to give him the chance of saving his estate by renewing the proclamation. If the Collector may at any time prevent the occurrence of such a difficulty, by issuing his Notification a month before the day fixed. It is not necessary, that the landholder should acknowledge the receipt of the notice,—were that the case, he would always be out of the way. The zemindar has only to sit at his residence and retire, with sufficient evidence of his having thus served it.

THE BALI-KHAL BRIDGE.—We have much pleasure in publishing a letter from An Observer, on the subject of this useful undertaking. He places the matter altogether in a new light. We were not previously aware, that the Native gentry had taken so deep an interest in the question, and we think there is every reason to hope that their laudable exertions will be seconded by Government. The utility of the bridge is unquestionable. The fact, that the natives propose to raise half the sum, or 2000 Rupees, among themselves towards its completion, would of itself form a sufficient answer to all the objections, which the Correspondent of the Observer has urged, or may yet urge against it; and it is but reasonable that Government should lend its assistance to this enterprise. It would be reasonable even if no funds were available, and if they were required to be drawn from the public resources of the country. It is a more commendable work than the building of the Balakhal.

nistration, than to offer to meet one half the expenses of such works, when the native community offers a voluntary subscription of the other half. The funds of the state could not be laid out more advantageously in the improvement of the country, than in thus affording a stimulus to the zeal and generosity of the people. But when a fund to the extent of 80,000 Rupees exists, which Government has pledged itself to devote to the object of facilitating the means of internal communication, the projected bridge has an unquestionable claim on at least a fourth of this sum. We consider it therefore the duty of the Ferry Committee to lose no time in addressing the public authorities, with the view of obtaining a promise of one half the expense from the surplus funds in the Hooghly district, as soon as the other moiety shall have been raised by the public. Such an engagement would give a new impulse to the subscription now in progress, and change our hopes into certainty.

THE HARSHNESS OF EUROPEANS HAVING THEIR SUITS DECIDED BY NATIVE JUDGES.—The individual who reported a certain case to the Englishman, which appeared in that journal on the 8th of the last month, deserves attention, were it only for his indefatigable perseverance. In addition to the notice which appeared in that paper, a second reference has been made to the same case in the Agra Observer of the 24th December; and we have been favored with a letter which expresses much surprise at our having omitted to take it up. It would be difficult to account for such repeated impetuosity, except by ascribing it to a common origin.

The case thus brought forward is one of great hardship, but it appears to us to have arisen from an unaccountable misapprehension of the rules laid down for the guidance of the Courts. To prevent the recurrence of such acts of injustice, it is not necessary, as our correspondent suggests, to repeal the Act which subjects Europeans and Natives to the same tribunal, and which the Europeans have been accustomed to describe as the Black Act. We think this will appear self-evident from a very cursory examination of the case.

In the year 1837, it was determined that the original cognisance of all suits should be vested in the Unconvenanted Judges, the great majority of whom are Natives, leaving to the European officers the higher and more important function of hearing appeals from their decisions. The next year it was ordained by a Circular Order, that no suits should be referred to the Principal Sudder Ameen, in which the documentary evidence was in the English language, unless that officer was acquainted with it. The year after, this Order was modified, and it was directed that "the mere circumstance of the initial petition reciting the existence of an English document in support of a claim, was not to constitute a necessary ground for retaining the case on the Judge's file." The party, who tendered an English document to a Native Court, was required to file an Oordoo translation with it. In order that substantial justice might be rendered in every case, the Native Judge was directed, after the original and the translation had been filed, to send both up to the European Judge, who was instructed, with due adroitness to the nature of the English writing and of the transaction to which it related, to use his own discretion in referring the suit to the Native Judge, or in retaining it on his own file.

The Agra Observer, of the 24th December, says, that the second order rescinds the first, which it does not. The Editor calls this second order, "a precious Circular;" and so indeed it is, for it was manifestly dictated by a high sense of the duty of doing justice between man and man. It was intended, on the one hand, to prevent the unnecessary interference of the European Judges in cases cognisable by the Native Judges, merely on the ground that there was one single document written in English. It was intended, on the other hand, to prevent injustice, by giving the European Judge an opportunity of determining, from the character of this English deed, and its relation to the matter at issue, whether the ends of justice would not be promoted by retaining the case on his own file. The order itself is perfectly unobjectionable. The grievance, of just grievance, of which our correspondent complains, has arisen, not in consequence of its provisions, but owing to a total departure from them.

The case, as represented by the complainant, is this: A suit was brought by one European against another to the Civil Judge, who referred it to the Principal Native Judge of his Court. The party or parties thereupon represented that there were sixty or seventy documents in English, which it was next to impossible to translate into Hindoostanee, with sufficient accuracy to convey the meaning of them. It was entirely unnecessary for them to have added this latter clause to their petition. It was quite enough for them to have stated, that there were half a hundred English deeds to be read and digested, before the Judge could reach the marrow of the case. The lessons of stern experience have taught us, that nothing defies translation so effectually as English deeds drawn up by a thorough English lawyer. On receiving the representation, the Judge is stated to have written, that by the order of Oct. 31st, 1839, "the purport of which we have given above,"—he had no option but to send all cases to the Native Judges, whether connected with English documents or not, and that when the Principal Sudder Ameen sent in the papers, he would, if he deemed it necessary, retain the suit on his own file. Here one link in the chain of events is wanting, for we are not told, whether the Judge, on seeing the sixty barely intelligible English documents translated into utterly unintelligible Oordoo, determined to take the trouble of examining the suit himself; but as we are told that an appeal was made against the Judge's order to the Sudder, and that this Court decided that there was no occasion to change his order, we are led to suppose that the Judge instructed the Principal Sudder Ameen to make out the sixty translated documents in the best way he could, and decide the case. We are further informed, that this Officer, when the case came on finally in his tribunal, had the good sense to acknowledge his inability to decide it, and to send it back to the Judge. And thus eight months of precious time, and all the labour and expense of translating the aforesaid sixty documents into Oordoo, were lost.

Now the question is whether this grievance was occasioned by the Act, facetiously denominated the Black Act, or was it because the Civil Judges, and the Court of Sudder Dewanny were unable to comprehend the meaning of a certain Circular Order, the object and phrenology of which are as clear as the sun in the month of May. We trace it to this latter cause; we think, that if the Judges of the civil, or of the Zillah Court had rightly interpreted the order to signify, that no suit, of which the documentary evidence was beyond the clearest and undeniable comprehension of a Native Judge, should be transferred to his Court, they would have escaped the censure of our correspondent, and retained the confidence of the public.

THE RATES OF FREIGHT ON THE HINDOOSTAN STEAMER have been made public since our last issue, and they appear to be as reasonable, as the rates of passage money are the reverse. It is scarcely to be expected that much indigo or alkali, or indeed of any other produce will be despatched by Steamers, except under very extraordinary circumstances. The bulk of freight will probably consist of books and pamphlets, the chief value of which consists in their being fresh. The additional expense, as now established, of importing them through Egypt, bears no proportion to the advantage which will be enjoyed of receiving them within two months after their appearance in London. The charge for a cubic foot of literature is fixed at Seven Rupees and a half; and for this price one may import, on an average, twelve ordinarily sized octavo volumes, the cost of which at the present time, at the book-sellers, would be within Eighty Rupees. We may therefore expect, that when a monthly intercourse has been established from Calcutta to Suva, all the periodical publications, as well as the most interesting works of the month, will be placed within the reach of the reading public at a very small additional charge. Thus an additional interest will be given to every political and intellectual movement in our own beloved native land; and India will cease to be regarded as the land of exile.

We adverted last week to the subject of postage on the monthly steamers; and the question becomes the more interesting, as our prospects of a regular monthly communication becomes more proximate. Those who are in the habit of commissioning newspapers from England,—and the number of them will now be greatly augmented,—will naturally be anxious to make arrangements for receiving them by our own steamers; and it is therefore important that the amount of steam postage should be distinctly understood. At Bombay, no charge whatever is made on the receipt or the delivery of either letters or papers. In the case of the India, letters were charged at the rate of two annas for each letter and an anna for each newspaper. But there is one point on which it is important that the present system should be reformed. We allude to the arrangement by which the Steam postage of all letters, which are despatched from India or England, is thrown upon people at home, who are far more impatient of a shilling postage than we are of that of a Rupee.

It is very unreasonable that our friends and correspondents at home should be required to pay for the letters they receive as well as for those they send; and it is highly desirable that the arrangement should be modified. The burden ought to be more equitably distributed; and the parties on both sides of the water should be required to pay only for the letters they may respectively send. This would tend in no inconsiderable degree to increase the correspondence; many for many are now deterred on motives of delicacy from writing to their friends at home and entailing on them a heavy charge for postage. The subject ought to be taken up by the Government, the depository of which ought to be brought through its Majesty's Ministers at home.

WEEKLY ABSTRACT OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20.

—We are happy to learn that Lord Auckland has subscribed 5000 Rs. to the Afghan Relief Fund.

—In consequence of the Hindustan Steamer's starting for Suva on the 14th of January, the departure of the India Steamer has been judiciously postponed to the 10th of February. In the beginning of March we shall probably have the Tenasserim sent to Suva by Government; and the Hindustan will be back—that is to say, if she takes the best coal the country affords—in time to start in April.

—Letters have been received from Ferozepore, dated the 17th of December, on which day the troops, which formed the garrison of Jellalabad, crossed the Sutlege and were received in the most flattering manner by the Governor General. We have copied an account of the procession from the Englisman. It is gratifying to find that alterations have been made in the original programme, which are decided improvements. Dost Mahomed and the Afghan Chiefs were not required to be present at this triumphal procession, and the triumphal arch of brick and mortar was dispensed with.

—The following is Lord Ellenborough's own proclamation on this subject:

Camp Ferozepore, 17th December, 1861.—This day Major General Sir Robert Sale, &c., &c., passed the Sutlege at the head of all the troops which composed the garrison of Jellalabad.

The Major General was received at the foot of the bridge by the Governor General and his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

The Army of Reserve, formed in one line extending two miles and a half, received the Major General and the Garrison of Jellalabad in review order, with presented arms.

A salute of nineteen guns was fired as the Major General passed the centre of the line.

Captain Sumner, Military Secretary, and Captain Colville, A. D. C. to the Governor General, had on the 14th instant, conveyed the medals granted to the Garrison of Jellalabad, under an escort of the body-guard, to the camp of the Major General and all the officers and soldiers of the Garrison passed the bridge of the Sutlege, wearing the honors they have just won.

—There was as usual a grand Masonic procession the day before yesterday to the Cathedral, when the Rev. Mr. Fisher preached a sermon to the Brethren. An account of this procession, also, we have copied from our contemporary.

—The collection on Christmas-day at the Cathedral amounted to the sum of 1719 Rs. Though the Presbyterians do not appreciate Christmas day, they were resolved to make the most of it, and a collection was made in the morning at the Kirk, after an eloquent sermon by Dr. Charles, which amounted to 2060 Rs. The fragments were gathered up in the evening after a sermon by Mr. Smith, and they amounted to 300 Rupees.

—The new arrangement regarding the Scowles, for which we are indebted to the present Chief Justice, comes into question in the present year; in which there will be access instead of four gun deliveries. The Jury will, it is true, be summoned earlier, but it will sit a shorter time, and the inconvenience will not be increased; whereas these most frequent sessions will shorten the term of imprisonment for those who are charged with crime.

—The Harkness states, that the Amere of Scinde have positively refused to sign the treaty, and are preparing themselves for a revolt to arms. Should they hold out, General Vagler will be able to give good account of Hyderabad, and the army will not grumble at the millions of prize money the city is said to hold. It remains yet to be seen whether we have any more right to interfere with the independence of Scinde than with that of Afghanistan.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20.

—The Star, in the issue of this morning, gives a very different version of the conduct of General Nott in reference to the great gun, which Lord Ellenborough ordered to be brought from Afghanistan as a trophy, from that which has appeared in the papers. It relieves the General's conduct from that fractions appearance in some ways, and dispenses the assertion that he ordered Major Nott to pay no attention to General Pollock's trophies. As we were instrumental in propagating the unfounded and injurious rumour, we have copied the refutation; and recommend it to our readers.

—The case of James Kirnan, who addressed a letter to some time back, respecting what he supposed, were the unwarrantable assertions of the Press in his case, has now been found guilty at the Sessions, of an assault with intent to do some bodily harm.

—We have heard it stated, that the statement, we made some time ago, that there was no Hindoo temple at Somnath to receive the gates, was not correct. Not having visited the spot ourselves, we were obliged to depend for our information on those who had been there, and had recorded their observations. We are happy to find our assertions corroborated by a Friend of the Englisman, at Bombay, who visited the spot not long since, and states that the temple is now in ruins, and that the only portion left standing is surrounded by a Mahomedan dome.

—General Pollock's division crossed the Sutlege on the 16th. Its march was hastened by the appearance of rain which might have swelled the river and swept away the bridges.

—The Star states, that the Loll Bazar, the great resort of sailors, has been in a more disorderly state than usual. In this assemblage of gin palaces and brothels, revel and riot are not only the order of the day, but of the night also. It is there that the native, who admires the majesty of Britain, in its far spread empire, beholds its sons reduced to a condition lower than that of the brute. On the evening of Sunday last, four of the drunken sailors seized a gentleman's buggy; two of them mounted the horse, one took his seat along side of the driver, and the other got up behind. The reporter says, he coaxed them off with two or three Rupees apiece, which would only enable them to make greater beasts of themselves than they were before.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21.

—The Bombay Courier has just published a narrative of the sufferings to which the garrison of Ghuzni was subjected, after Col. Palmer had capitulated on the promise of a safe conduct to Peshawar. We have transferred the whole document to our column. It will be read with a deep and painful interest. We hope next week to be able to offer some observations both on this narrative and on that which we republished last week, relative to the retreat from Cabul.

—Mr. William Francis Thompson, of the Civil Service, has put a period to his existence, in one of the dark Bungalows at or near Agrā.

—The whole of General Pollock's force having crossed the Sutlege, the 20th Native Infantry was, by order of the Governor General, formed into a hollow square, when his Lordship informed them that for their gallant conduct in the field, he would make them a Light Infantry corps. The respectful notice taken of this corps is said to be recorded in Camp as somewhat irridulous.

MONDAY, JANUARY 2, 1862.

—The Englisman has with the beginning of the present year, put on a new dress, and appears in new type. The Daily Star has been enlarged and is now published in two sheets. The Meerut Liberator and the Bombay Courier, both announce, an augmentation of size, and thus we have an unequivocal token of the increase of the reading public in India.

—The Agre Ekbar states, that the Rev. Francis St. Edmund passed through Sikhand on his way to Ferozepore, to minister to the wants of the Catholics in the army collected on the banks of the Sutleges, who are said to amount to four thousand.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 3.

—General Nott's Brigade marched across the bridge of the Sutlege on the 23rd of December, and was cordially welcomed to the British territory by the Governor General. His Lordship gave an entertainment to the General and his staff in the evening.

—At the Opium Sale held yesterday, 4005 chests of Opium were disposed of at a very high rate; the Behar averaged 1430 Rs. the Benares 1280 Rs. the chest. The result of the sale was nearly Seventy lakhs of Rupees. The clear profit to Government of this first sale of the year was half a million sterling.

—We find that Sir Charles Napier did actually insert in his Division Orders, "Gentlemen, as well as beggars, may if they like, come to the drill when they get on horseback, but neither gentlemen nor leggers have a right to send other people there, which will be the case if furious driving be allowed in camp or bazar." This order ends in a marvellous strain, but we fully concur with the Bombay Times that it is "full of strong sense, wit, and sarcastically put;" more especially the 8th paragraph which orders that "Officers commanding Regiments must be particular not to fire till they see their front perfectly clear; to-day we fired on our own pickets."

—The report which was given yesterday, of farther disturbances in Bundelkand, appears groundless. After the difficulties which our armies have had to cope with in Afghanistan and the scenes of mortal struggle through which they have been called to pass, this insurrection in Bundelkand appears very trifling.

—We are happy to find that the gallant Captain Anderson, who has commanded the Sherif's artillery throughout the whole of the campaign with such distinguished honour, is to be rewarded with the gunpowder agency at Imphora.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4.

—The Court Martial for the trial of the prisoners returning from Afghanistan has been organized at Ferozepore. Sir Joseph Thackwell has been nominated President.

—The two bridges across the Sutlege have been swept away by a sudden rise in the river. It was a fortunate circumstance that the last Brigade of the army of Afghanistan had passed over before the bridges disappeared.

—The Postscript to a letter which appears in the Harkness of this morning, states, that Sher Singh was waghal, that is, sulky, and would not visit Lord Ellenborough.

—From the same journal we learn, that at the banquet given by the Governor General to the 11-Regiments Garrison of Jellalabad, while his Lordship alluded distinctly to the services of the officers, whose merits had been most complacently displayed during the siege, the name of Major McGregor was passed over in a manner which could not be mistaken. No man during that memorable siege, rendered himself more deserving of the commendation of Government by his indefatigable zeal, activity, and courage, than the late political Agent, Sir Robert Sale. It is said, however, his health in the course of the evening, and acknowledged the important assistance he had derived from him during the investment of the town.

—We stated in our last number that the issue of general warrants was not common, much less universal, in the courts in the interior, and that it was the exception, not the rule; and we cited in exemplification, the recent case of the Native convert in the Court of the Et-Berghum. We have been since informed that we did not put the case in its true light. The fact is that the Magistrate refused to issue his warrant, unless the Missionary would swear that the young man was at that identical time in a particular house or place; that he was there in close confinement, and that his life mittee resolved to send a copy of that letter to the Committee of the former district for co-operation. The accompanying is a copy of the letter alluded to, you can either publish it or not as you think proper. The subscription is, I am happy to hear, progressing in both the districts, notwithstanding the formidable opposition of the Harkara Correspondent. The estimated cost of the bridge is about 40,000 Rs., of which it is proposed to raise one-half by subscription and to apply to Government to grant the other half from the accumulated Ferry Funds. The accumulation in the Hooghly district alone exceeds, if I mistake not, 80,000 Rs., so the call upon Government to pay about $\frac{1}{2}$ of what is taken from a single district for a work of such public utility, will not be deemed, I hope, either very selfish or unreasonable on the part of the people. If these facts will not convince the Correspondent of the Harkara, he is welcome to attribute as much aristocratical and private motives to the advocates of the Bridge as will gratify his feelings.

JA. EDWARDS, Esq.

Secy. to the Sariput Ferry Fund Committee, Hooghly.

SIR.—Having been requested by the Committee to state the advantages the public is likely to derive from placing an Iron Suspension Bridge over the Khal at Bally, I have the honour to state that the Khal in question is situated within the Civil Jurisdiction of the 24-Parganahs at the distance of four miles north-west of Calcutta on the west Bank of the river Hooghly; it is a branch of the Surroetry River, and is joined to the Hooghly by a large and populous village called Bally, from which it derives its name. Balokhal. Since the dissemination of Blackboard road via Bollen, all the merchandise from the Western Provinces to Calcutta, and vice versa by land carriage passes over this Khal, and as it intercepts the great western road, innumerable travellers have to cross it daily. The extraordinary communication by this road may be gathered from the circumstance of the ferry collections of this Nulka having been increased from 800 Rs. to 3000 Rs. annually during the last few years. A bridge at this place will greatly tend to facilitate this communication and consequently there will be an accession to the commerce of the city of Calcutta, and its concomitant advantages to the country in general and its vicinity in particular. Independent of these, the local agriculture will be largely benefited. The principle Landholders, who own land in this neighbourhood, are Baboo Dewarajah Tagore, Byramnath Chowdhry, Ummedah Purnanath Roy and the minor ones (now under the Court of Wards) of the late Harriah Chunder Roy. What a blessing it will be to the Ryots, who, from miles distance take the produce of the lands daily to the Calcutta Market, and on the sale of which they chiefly depend for the payment of revenue. But what appears to me to be fraught with incalculable advantage to the people of Calcutta is, that this bridge, with the steam ferry bridge now in contemplation to be put over the Hooghly, will naturally connect this part of the country with the Suburbs of Calcutta. Numerous buildings will rise up immediately on this side of the river and afford a healthy and cheap residence to a large number of the new denizens of Calcutta. It will not be uncommon then for parties to go and return from Serampore in their evening drives. Although I have not exaggerated the advantages of the proposed bridge, yet I would humbly submit that if even a part of these be acknowledged by the cautious public, the work ought not to be delayed any longer from the comparatively small outlay required for the purpose.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND FIELD OFFICES.
As proof of the increased attention to official propriety now paid by the clergy of the Established Church, the diminished number of that body who qualify themselves for what are called field sports, by taking out game certificates, may be adduced. There are not more than 30 persons in England in the first publication of the game lists for the county of Essex for the present year; the number was, within a few years, more than double.—Globe.

THE BAPTISTS IN DENMARK.—MY DEAR BROTHER.—Considering the cordial and self-sacrificing interest which you hitherto have shown, in the good and evil fortune of your Danish brethren, I am convinced that the continued record of the Lord's guiding of his people in this country will not weary you. And believing that the communication of our joys and sorrows may afford you, as well as many others of our English brethren, spiritual enjoyment, and even support, consolation, and encouragement, I take the liberty of exhibiting to you a concise survey of what has happened since my last report.

After my property, as well as that of my brother Adolph and friend Ryding, had been sold to pay the fines and costs in which we had been arrested, we were (secondarily) liberated from prison, where my brother had lain on a bed of sickness, and which kept him confined to his couch for more than a month after our discharge. I myself did immediately enter on my journey to Hamburg, though somewhat suffering from a pulmonary complaint arising from the damp prison air; not, however, in the same degree as my brother, who has also but some heart-frost from his wife's death and his child's illness. I began to arrange the concerns of our church, which had become disorganised during our long imprisonment. I undertook a journey to Hamburg, and contacted our experienced brother Ocken, who indefatigably assisted us both with act and advice; and subsequently made a missionary tour to Langeland and the western part of Seeland, on purpose to visit the churches there; and, through God's grace, I have seen much spiritual fruit from this journey, although the vicissitudes of my journey as at my heels, and spent out my undertakings.

As soon as my brother recovered from his illness, he set out for Aalborg, in order to establish the church there, and exert himself for the mission in Jutland, and in the hope of the victory of light and truth over the prince of darkness and falsehood. He has had much spiritual joy from this journey, the fruits of which will not be wanting.

Although surprised with, and having no immediate prospect of meeting, that presynodical which we so greatly needed, (being by a second imprisonment and fine quite ruined), we were not put to the blush of such a liberty as we have enjoyed in this country. Our brethren in England and the United States, sent us assistance which was not inconsiderable, by which our immediate wants were supplied, two brethren liberated from the disgraceful punishment of imprisonment, &c. and the expenses of our journeys defrayed. Thus we have many proofs of the faithfulness of our God and Saviour, though we sometimes may be weak enough to doubt, because we do not always understand the mysterious ways of the Lord. We are, through that considerate aid which from time to time has been sent us from England and America, in part relieved from that bodily want and necessity which accompanies such a persecution; and we have that confidence in God, that he will, therefore, as long as it is required for the propagation of his kingdom on our part, send us his faithful, thinking hearts towards us, and that the trial may be more severe than that which we are enabled to sustain (I unite full victory). In spite of all obstacles by which it has been attempted to prevent our increase, the Lord has, from eleven, (the number of the congregation first established three years ago) augmented our number to two hundred regenerated souls, who, in the autumn of last year, praise the Saviour for his liberation from Egyptian thraldom.

But still we have a severe conflict remaining. Still the magistrates, who yield to an absolute law against Anabaptists, and which is pretended to apply to Baptists, continue to imprison, prosecute, condemn, and detain to the last. Thus, coarse, sheep, and farmers, who are not in the least connected with the church in Western Seeland, because he keeps devotional meetings; and besides, a separate account has been brought against him for administering the Lord's Supper; the sentence is in temporary imprisonment; he is in Langland as action has been, for the fifth time, been brought against the pastor is sentenced to pay a considerable fine. Several brethren of the different churches are still under prosecution, and must stand for the fines to which they are subjected, by disgraceful imprisonment, and loss of property. I should regret, if I had the misfortune of the example, willingly have, in this manner, ended for the fine which I was sentenced to pay, yet our laws do not allow to any body who is in the rank of a citizen, this mode of atoning for fines; when, however, there is nothing more to be attained from them, such persons are by a protracted simple arrest, (in which two-pence a day and one pound of bread is allowed to them for their sustenance,) made to atone for their sins. Truly this is a most cruel and very great, as they consist mostly of poor people, and the few who had some property have been made for the common good. We are, however, not if we only care to receive the Lord's blessing. And if religious liberty can be obtained at so easy a purchase as the sacrifice of the liberty, health, and temporal goods, it is for nothing when compared with what we have seen in England; who, two hundred through the Lord's power, were victorious, which we have commenced; relying, as some have done, on the power of what power also is perfected in our infirmity.

Two professors, Messrs. Conant and Lachet, sent by the Baptists of North America, were here lately on purpose (like our dear English brethren last year) to obtain from the State a recognition of the Baptists. They had no interview with our King, being absent on a journey, but they applied to the supreme court in Copenhagen, and received the desired effect of them much esteem and kindness; but, at the same time, how little their intervention was regarded appeared in this, that the next Sunday after their departure the police made a search of our assembly, and in the middle of our devotional exercises, in rather an insolent manner, dispersed us, the great amusement of the mob being to see the English, and in the middle of this intemperate, as well as that of the English, will not be without prospective advantage and blessing to us, since these have, in part, been the cause of the kindness and esteem which the King, the Queen, and all the higher social authorities, show towards us; and we are likewise protected by all respectable journalists, and particularly our friend Mr. Hoff, the interpreter who continues indefatigably, as well in conversation as through the press, to exert himself in our behalf, and also for general religious liberty in Denmark.

An apologetic work of considerable merit is in process of publication, by a highly respected person named Eriksen, a graduate of divinity, chiefly directed against an attack on the Baptists by one Bishop Faber. I venture to say that he is the best of his kind, much from this work, of which the respected author has communicated a part to me in manuscript, and allowed me to make some illustrative remarks upon it. The only visible obstacle at present to the complete victory of Baptist principles in Denmark is the total lack of pecuniary means; for even should our sovereign monarch (as I hope he may) be so inclined by circumstances, and by partly from love to the Baptists, he will grant to them freedom of worship, we will not, from the above-mentioned cause, be able to avail ourselves of such a liberty as we have enjoyed in this country. Christian dignity, compared with the other tolerated sects. We are, for example, not able to procure a plain decent accommodation for our public meetings, which are now visited by several hundreds of people, for whom there is no room, and who must go away again without having heard any thing. Only in the house and in the confidence that he who has said, "I seek ye out the kingdom of God and not man," and all these things shall be added unto you," is a God of truth, and mighty enough to fulfil his promise, we continue the conflict which we have commenced, in his holy name. The blood-bespoken love of Christ, whose inscription is "I have been crucified," leads us to eternal victory.

Well may you and your very many of our dear English friends remember us in their work, suffering brethren, in their fervent prayers to the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, who is also their Father and ours, if any, with the belief of a brother, from our congregation, you, in Christ, obtained brotherly love.

PRUSSIA.—The German Journal of Frankfurt, of the 10th inst., has just been supplied by the King of Prussia to a deputation from the citizens of Königsberg, who waited on his Majesty on his passage through that town on his return from St. Petersburg with a remonstrance against the proposed law. However, as professor of Theology, on account of his religious opinions. His Majesty replied to the deputation in the following terms:

"I have never received a complaint against the Minister of Public Instruction, Mr. Eberhard. This complaint is directed not only against the Professor Eberhard, but likewise against myself, for Mr. Eberhard has acted in a most prudent manner. I desire the Minister to be an honourable man, although the party called 'Young Germany' have taken the liberty to say that he is a Mucker and a pietist. The Minister, I repeat, is an honourable man; it is impossible for him to do so. You explain of Dr. Eberhard, he

THE SOMNATH GATES.—When we heard that Lord Ellenborough, after having ordered Dost Mahomed and the Afghan prisoners to appear before him at Ferozepore, and make their obeisance, would send the troops which had returned in triumph from Afghanistan, he has ordered the matter, and permitted the prisoners to proceed to their desolated country without this humiliating ceremony, there appears to us some hope that the proceedings of the Gates would also be recent. But about a week. The following proclamation announced the Lord's decision to permit in this very anxious proceeding, and unless peremptory orders from him should bar their progress, there is every reason to fear that they will pursue their course to the fabled temple on the sea shore. If it be the House of Commons may not be disposed to provoke his Lordship to throw up the Government, by thwarting him at the top. If his heart in this matter, it is very probable to be questioned whether the good sense of the people, or of the Ministry, in England, will ever allow it to set of folly to be consummated. It is not likely to be approved of by the Court of Directors, will permit Christian officers to be of the character of the present Government, and to be the cause of the British flag, and fixing the old nation gate to a Russian in the streets. meetings which excited hatred, and nets which were supposed to justify execution, but on no occasion with conduct calculated to bring Government into contempt. And of all the transactions of the present administration, however singular and objectionable they may appear, there is nothing to be compared with this unhalloved process of the heathen gates from Ghazni to Somnath.

It would be uncharitable to question the propriety of the intentions in which even this objectionable act may have originated. It is easy to suppose that his Lordship may have been persuaded by his own arguments, of the policy of endeavouring to efface the remembrance of those unenviable disasters, by some visible tokens of our triumph which should attract the eyes of all India to it. The procession was doubtless designed to produce an effect which might serve to consolidate our power. But his Lordship has been singularly mistaken in all his calculations. The restoration of the gates will excite the Mahomedan population without strengthening the attachment of the Hindus; while thought on the Empire, in a Christian world, it is likely to be regarded with feelings of indignation. In England, the effect will be to excite the indignation of our friends, by making our triumph, by making our triumph, by making our triumph.

When Parliament meets, it will be impossible for Sir Robert Peel, with all his talents, to frame any excuse for such a proceeding. The Ministry will be happy to stand out before the attacks of the opposition, to save themselves from being involved in the ridicule of this proceeding. As it has not found a single defender in India, even in those Journals which are famous for their defence of Afghan treachery, so neither in England will any Journal, which has a character to lose or to gain, undertake the defence of it. Among politicians, it will shake the confidence in an administration which cannot be allowed to so public a proceeding, while the people will be exasperated by the defence of the Ministry. In England, will ever allow it to set of folly to be consummated. the latter totally neglected. But a sufficient reason may be found in the fact, that Major Pattle has the honour of a Court Martial to be held, and cannot so received officially by the Government, before he has satisfied the circumstances under which he had assumed the political troops, of which he had assumed the political troops, of which he had assumed the political troops.

When we think of the triumph of Aquila which the British forces have presented to Major Pattle, in the triumph of their deliverance, and that we have equalled the appointment of the Court which has been appointed to try him for his conduct. It is among the most singular events to which the triumph has given rise, that when the Governor General has been ordered to Ferozepore to greet the British forces, that when the Governor General has been ordered to Ferozepore to greet the British forces, that when the Governor General has been ordered to Ferozepore to greet the British forces.

with even greater interest than that which is attached to the victory of the 7th of April, in which the Jellalabad garrison achieved their liberation.—It is the successful effort made at Panjwar for the deliverance of the party, in which, by common consent, Major Pottinger bore the chief share. The conciliation of the Hazarch, the effectual gaining over of Mahomed Shah, which required the exercise of no ordinary skill; the mustering of the little garrison consisting of officers and 387 men, the sole remnant of Cabul; the determination to defend the fort with this handful against all odds; the arrangements made to secure a supply of water, to repair the fortifications and to stand a siege, all betoken a mind of the first order, which always rises with the emergency into which it is thrown. These arrangements, made in circumstances which to other minds would have appeared desperate, bear the same stamp of genius with the efforts which for eight months defended Herat against the host of Persia. But for Major Pottinger's exertions and success at Bamiana, how poor would have been Lord Ellenborough's triumphs at Ferozpoor. Indeed there could have been no triumph at all; for either the troops would have been obliged to winter at Cabul, or they must have returned without the prisoners; and to have celebrated their return in such circumstances, with any demonstration of joy, would have been an insult to humanity. To Major Pottinger, therefore, does Lord Ellenborough owe pre-eminently the opportunity he has enjoyed for this grand display at Ferozpoor; and we hope in a short time to hear that the Court Martial has honourably acquitted him, and thus enabled the Governor General to give him that distinguished reception, which his services have so richly earned.

THE FIVE PER CENT. LOAN has closed almost as unexpectedly as it opened. The holders of the Four Per Cent. are in ecstasy. Their Notes, which were at one time depressed to fourteen per cent. discount, have already risen to their old standard of four per cent., and this closing of the Exchequer against further receipts at five per cent. will be equivalent to putting nearly eighty lakhs of Rupees into their pockets.

The war in Afghanistan is therefore definitely closed; the troops are retiring to the repose of their cantonments, to talk over their exploits; and the loan which was kept open to supply their necessities, has been sealed up. Of the amount of debt actually incurred by our campaigns beyond the Indus, we are not able to give any accurate statement, but we think five millions sterling will be found rather above than below the mark. Three years of good husbandry of the public resources will be amply sufficient to liquidate this sum; and at the end of that period, Government will probably be in possession of a surplus income of a million and a half, or two millions sterling a year, to be devoted either to the extinction of the new debt, or to internal improvements. What may yet await us in the course of Providence, it is not for short sighted mortals to predict. But unless very unforeseen combinations should arise out of European politics, to roll the tide of invasion from Central Asia upon these provinces, there is little probability of the occurrence of events between the Indus and the Inwaddy, which will call for any extraordinary military expenditure. It may be thought to coerce Scinde and the Punjab; but the wealth of those countries will afford us a sufficient indemnity. Nepal will scarcely prove refractory, after the "great moral lesson" we have read the Court of Pekin; and if we should ever be called to interfere in the affairs of Burmah, the war may be completed at a tenth of the outlay which the first war entailed on us, while the acquisition of its maritime provinces, and more especially of the Tunk forests, will render such a war an eventual advantage to us, as it would undoubtedly be to the people.

There is nothing indeed, in the present aspect of circumstances, or in the state of the finances, which should prevent Government, even now, doing that which it has never yet done—devoting fifty lakhs of Rupees a year, or two and a half per cent. of its annual rent roll, to the improvement of the estate, in the construction of roads, bridges, and canals, and the establishment of Schools and a good police. This would still leave more than a crore of Rupees of surplus revenue a year, for the object of clearing off the incumbrance occasioned by the Afghan war. It would prolong the liquidation of the new debt, it is true, for two or three years, but it would give the country such an impulse, as it has never received since we assumed the administration.

Indeed judging from past experience, it would appear to be for the interest of the country that the period of a surplus revenue should be delayed rather than accelerated. India, has never yet reaped any benefit from a full exchequer. The generosity of Government seems to have been always contracted, in exact proportion as its treasury was replenished. Never have the Court of Directors had the heart to say, even in the most palmy state of the finances, "a third of our surplus revenue shall be sacredly devoted to public objects." The assurance that the results of the Treasury were choked up with coin they knew not what to do with, has always been more grateful than the assurance, that the superfluous revenue had been employed in augmenting the source from which it was derived. The coin which was thus hoarded with a miser's avarice has however soon disappeared. When Lord Hastings had bequeathed a full treasury to his successor, and Government refused to give back any portion of these funds for public objects, the Bursawee war came and swallowed all the funds up. When Lord William Bentinck again had restored the public finances to a healthy state, the Afghan war came down on us and more than exhausted all our treasures. It was the possession of large unappropriated funds, which may be considered in both these instances, as having in some measure encouraged the war, by affording such eminent facilities for beginning it. Had the treasury been empty, it is probable that the propriety of hostilities might not have been quite so apparent, or that the difficulty of equipping an army for the field, from the absence of the sinews of war, might have enforced the necessity of looking to some other expedient for meeting the difficulties of the crisis.

THE MANCHESTER BANK.—The last Mail has brought intelligence of the failure of the Bank of Manchester, of which the Capital was 750,000*l*. This is the sixth bank, which has been closed in that town within the last six years, five of which were Joint Stock Banks. The subscribed capital of these banks amount to a sum rather above two millions and a half sterling; out of the wreck of which not more than 6*l*, or at the furthest 700,000*l*, are likely to be realized. The annual returns of trade of the six banks amounted, six years ago, to at least 50*l* millions sterling, which vast sum imported life and vigor to the manufactures of the district. The stagnation of trade, which is now so severely felt, has been ascribed to the existence of the Corn-Laws and the consequent high price of Corn, as well as to the gradual swelling of markets on the Continents of Europe and America against us. That these events have contributed to produce the present distress, there can be no doubt; but to form a correct view of the cause of the difficulties in this district, we must bring to account the desolation occasioned by these repeated bankruptcies. Even under the most favorable circumstances, if the trade in corn was free, and the outlets for our productions unrestricted, such extensive failures could not fail to paralyze the energies of the manufacturing community, and shake the confidence of the public at large. And it will doubtless be found that the destruction of commercial capital, occasioned by these failures, has been as influential in occasioning the distress under which the country labours, as the distress of corn and the loss of our national customers.

The disclosure, which has been made in consequence of this failure, have been considered by those who are unfavorable to Joint Stock Banks, as illustrating the natural tendency of such institutions to abuse. There is some truth in their reasoning, mixed up perhaps with not a little prejudice. It is however a fact, that Chartered Banks have not been found to enjoy an unlimited lease of life, and that many of them have been carried away into the abyss of bankruptcy.

Chartered Banks may likewise be mismanaged, and where there is mismanagement, the mere possession of a Charter is no obstacle to bankruptcy. The real question is, whether Chartered Banks or Joint Stock Banks are, from their constitution, most liable to that kind of misrule which is the shortest cut to the Insolvent Court. Judging from past experience, we should say, that Joint Stock Associations are exposed to rather greater danger than their chartered competitors. There is an inherent tendency in them to fall into the hands of a junta, who mystify the public every six months by incomprehensible accounts, and meanwhile work the funds and the credit of the Bank for their own advantage. There is a greater disposition in these associations to foster extravagant speculations, than to encourage honest industry. They may be considered high pressure steam engines, always more liable to burst than the low pressure engines. They stand therefore in peculiar need of careful and jealous watching; while, at the same time, they naturally slide into a system of organization, which fills public suspicion, and excludes public control. Hence they never seem to give any kind of intimation of their approaching fall; the canker worm is often found to be devouring their vitals at the time when their outward appearance is most blooming.

It is wise to learn from the misfortunes of our neighbors. This maxim, so useful in private life, is of peculiar importance in reference to Banking Associations, which, if managed with prudence and caution, will serve to stimulate industry throughout a whole district, but if conducted in a spirit of heedless extravagance, will involve in ruin all those who are unfortunately connected with them. Viewed in this light, the fall of the Manchester Bank is pregnant with instruction, which ought to be turned to public advantage.

The Bank possessed a paid up Capital of 750,000*l*. It was placed under the management of Mr. Burdett and a Board of Managers, and for several years appeared to be in a very flourishing condition. After successively paying handsome dividends, there was a surplus of 130,000*l.* on the books. But the caution or the honesty of the Managers began to slacken. A Mr. I. H. Heron was actually permitted to remain in the Direction, after he had compromised his engagements with the Bank for ten shillings in the pound. Very heavy advances were made upon very inadequate security. The Circular to Bankers, of the 14th October last, remarks with great justice, that "Bankers in manufacturing districts work at a decided disadvantage compared with Bankers in purely mercantile places; because in the former case they must, in many instances, seek their security in pledges of mills, factories, mines, &c.; which, with a succession of years of adverse trade, become valueless and unsaleable; in the latter case they can take pledges of produce, which, with a fair margin, will always prove good securities." The Manchester Bank was, from the necessity of its position, and not from choice, obliged to take in pawn this very dangerous description of property, and, having once admitted itself with mills and factories, was eventually obliged, as the Manchester Observer remarks, to work them on its own account; which of course was not done except at a great loss, only less than that which would have been incurred by bringing them at once to the hammer. The Bank also came under heavy and unwarrantable advances to particular firms. Mr. Richard Roberts received advances to the extent of 74,000*l.*; Messrs. Hilton and Co. of 120,000*l.*, and Joseph Huleigh and Co. of 170,000*l.* Thus, one half its Capital was locked up in the speculations of other individuals. But the evil day of reckoning was put off by various dilations, of which some of the Managers were the authors, and others the victims. A year before the Bank stopped, it was admitted that the surplus fund had been reduced from 120,000*l.* to 10,321*l.*; yet the affairs of the Bank were still represented to be sound. At the meeting which was then held, namely in October 1841, when suspicions had begun to spread regarding its condition and prospects, some of the Managers declared with exultation, that not only was the subscribed Capital untouched, but that there was a surplus of 19,000*l.*; and a Mr. Alderman Chappel said, in his simplicity, that there wanted only "a cordial support among the proprietors, to make the Bank of Manchester stand No. 1, among the Joint Stock Banks of Manchester."

In less than a twelvemonth after this flourish of the trumpet, namely, on the 4th of October, Mr. Durdlekin absconded to America, the Bank stopped payment, and it was discovered that the surplus fund of the past year and the profits of the present year, amounting to 43,000*l.*, were gone,—that the whole of the subscribed Capital of 750,000*l.* had disappeared,—and that the liabilities of the Bank were 16,000*l.* beyond its estimated assets; which said sum of 16,000*l.* the shareholders, who are many of them men of property, will be called on to make good, as well as every loss which may arise from the depreciation of the estimated assets, and this in addition to the entire sacrifice of the whole value of their shares. Well may the paper we have quoted remark, that "Such a tissue of gross mismanagement of funds and reckless gambling with other people's money, as that disclosed by the annual meeting, stands without a parallel in the History of Banking."

ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT IN INDIA.—The Harkers has stated that the Law Commission, which is about to be abolished, proposes as the last act of its existence, to abolish imprisonment for debt in India. Apart from the intrinsic merits of this question, we are at a loss to perceive how such a measure can fall within the province of the Law Commission. Their duties, as defined in the Charter are to make enquiries, propose a Code, which is to be laid upon the table of the House of Commons. The current legislation of the country is committed to the Legislative Council, and not to the Commission; and we can only account for the present announcement, by reference to the fact, that the Commissioners have hitherto been employed in any and every duty, except property may afford, it is indispensable that arrangements should be made to prevent the fictitious for this the Commissioners are not to blame, for they have acted under orders they could not disobey or controvert.

It is very possible that the Legislative Council, weighed down as it has been with the burden of legislation since Lord Ellenborough's arrival, may have requested the Members of the Law Commission to draft a law for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, and that the Commissioners, considering this law as likely to be their last labour, may have undertaken the task; and a more important, if not difficult task they could scarcely have touched. The principle of imprisonment for debt is one of the most ancient and at the same time the most iniquitous, which it is possible to conceive. It is absurd to lock a man up in jail, and thus deprive him of the means of exerting himself for the payment of his debts, in order to accelerate the liquidation of them. It is iniquitous to punish a man by incarceration, and to reduce his family to starvation, because he has contracted obligations, which, from some contingency he is unable to fulfil, and thus treat an unfortunate man with the severity of a criminal. It is part and parcel of the same bloody code of England, which consigned forty-eight thousand victims to death in the reign of Henry the Eighth, 1541, when suspicions had begun to spread regarding its condition and prospects, some of the Managers declared with exultation, that not only was the subscribed Capital untouched, but that there was a surplus of 19,000*l.*; and a Mr. Alderman Chappel said, in his simplicity, that there wanted only "a cordial support among the proprietors, to make the Bank of Manchester stand No. 1, among the Joint Stock Banks of Manchester."

These are the principles which are now gaining ground in England; and every year tears away one fibre after another of our mistaken partiality for the sanguinary code of the dark ages of English legislation. Whether this country is as yet prepared for the adoption of this principle cannot be determined, except by much consideration. In this part of India every man is either a borrower or a lender; nine-tenths of the community are in debt to the remaining tenth. No man seems to have any horror of debt, or to feel any exaltation when he can write himself a free man. Those who have money seem quite as eager to risk it, with inefficient security, on thirty-seven and a half per cent. interest, as those who have nothing are anxious to borrow it. Of course, the imprisonment of the debtor is the main security on which the creditor eventually depends for the payment of his debt. The abolition of this security would at first occasion much inconvenience and loss, but it would probably prove very beneficial in the end, by rendering the mortgaged man less eager to endanger his money by lending it to those whom he cannot seize and imprison. And whatever increases a just sense of borrowing would be a real benefit to the country.

But the abolition of this practice would be safe unless it was accompanied by a complete organization of a system of Registry. If Government intend to withdraw the hold it has on the person of his debtor, and leave him no other security than that which his property may afford, it is indispensable that arrangements should be made to prevent the fictitious from this the Commissioners are not to blame, for they have acted under orders they could not disobey or controvert. The principle of imprisonment for debt is one of the most ancient and at the same time the most iniquitous, which it is possible to conceive. It is absurd to lock a man up in jail, and thus deprive him of the means of exerting himself for the payment of his debts, in order to accelerate the liquidation of them. It is iniquitous to punish a man by incarceration, and to reduce his family to starvation, because he has contracted obligations, which, from some contingency he is unable to fulfil, and thus treat an unfortunate man with the severity of a criminal. THE EGYPTIAN SOCIETY.—We have much pleasure in publishing the prospectus of a Society which has been for some time established in Egypt, to collect information regarding that ancient country, now rendered doubly interesting to the residents in India. It will be seen that one of the main objects of this association is to collect a library of references, and to form an institution which may afford facilities for the researches of those who take an interest in the antiquities of the land of the Pharaohs and the Pyramids. This institution cannot fail to prove advantageous in an eminent degree to those, who may make some stay in Egypt in their voyage between India and Europe. Much previous time is now lost to enquirers, before they know how and where to begin their enquiries; while the absence of works to assist their researches too often induces them to neglect all enquiry. This association will furnish the traveller and the sojourner with the means of directing his attention to whatever has a prominent interest in the wonders of Egypt, and thus enable him to make the most of his time and double the value of his visit. We would earnestly recommend it to the patronage of every intellectual individual, who may take his way in his route from hence to his native land, and would advise him to encourage the institution, by a life subscription. He will thus not only reap a personal benefit from the advantages which it affords, but also enjoy the satisfaction of assisting them for the benefit of others.

The Church Magazine.—No periodical that we are acquainted with has experienced a renovation of its existence so often as that which has now assumed the above title. We shall be only rejoiced to find it manifested a proportionate vitality. By its late change, from a Church of England, to a Church Magazine, it ceases to appear as the organ of a section of the Church; and consequently it takes a more liberal tone, and claims a wider range of sympathy and support. Perhaps in this the risk is run of losing sight of passing events and practical matters, and so of failing in gaining the public ear. Indeed the subject-matter of the new Editor seems to say, that his grand object will be to awaken personal religion, and further a devout and contemplative spirit in his readers. And truly a more pure, a more Christian object could not be chosen. If he succeeds, he will have the happiness of accomplishing what of all things is at present most wanted in the Christian Church. For this very reason his success is the more uncertain. In the Church, as well as in the world, the present is an age of strife, noise and bustle; and any man of tolerable ability who will take a heterodox part on any side is sure of some attention; and in proportion to his violence he may expect to be favoured and applauded. Should he think the excesses of one party a compensation for the blows of another, he may attain a kind of stormy enjoyment. The present Editor of the Church Magazine has chosen another and a better part: and we shall take it as a token for good to the Church, if his hopes are realised. We need scarcely say that in his success we shall unfeigningly rejoice.

ADDRESS.

Our readers will perceive that this periodical is presented to them, this day, in an altered form. Its name has been slightly changed; and its size considerably enlarged, without any increase of price. Its principles are now sufficiently manifested by the motto we have selected from Chillingworth, and its management has been transferred to other hands.

Our object in carrying on this labour of love, will be, to treat in simplicity and godly sincerity, "O glory to thee in the midst, and on Earth peace, good-will towards men." We therefore desire to proceed in humble dependence on the Divine blessing, and in the spirit of fervent prayer. We desire hence, also, the co-operation of our friends, that they, with us, may supplicate the giver of every good and every perfect gift, for some grant to this glory from this publication. Our hearty desire is to promote the edification of the Lord's beloved people; and the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom; by calling those who are yet ignorant of the infinite glory of the Saviour's love, to a knowledge of His Great Salvation. And, if, lost our wandering sheep be brought through the means of our labours into the fold of the Good Shepherd, we shall rejoice unfeignably. In being thus highly honoured as the chosen instruments of so mighty and blessed a change.

We very earnestly request assistance and communications, from all who sympathize with us in our anxious hope, that this Magazine may be brought forth as the means of exalting the Nations, and making known to this perishing world His unsearchable riches. We humbly commend the undertaking, and on Him alone do we rely. "The beauty of the Lord our God is upon us, and shall make that the work of our hands upon us; as ye shall see."—The Church Magazine. WEEKLY EPILOGUE OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5.

—The Star of this morning mentions, that the Committee of the Ryan Testimonial Fund, have just published their accounts, among which is the novel and objectionable item of 400 Rs. as Compensation to the Secretary. We do not remember a single instance, in which a punishment has been allowed to the Secretary of these voluntary funds. His office is always considered honorary; his labor is one of love, not profit; at least so it is understood by those who acquiesce in his taking on him those duties. It will be necessary for the public to open their eyes, which are too often shut within the ditch.—Each another matter of a subscription is on the tapis.

—Major Abbott, has been duly installed in charge of the Gun carriage agency. The Harbinger says the late Agent was not unkind to leave office immediately; but Major Lumsdaine had signified his intention to retire, and the Governor-General would not allow him to change his mind. Our contemporary says, that his Lordship would have made room for Major Broadbent in an equally summary way, but Mr. Blomfield would not take the hint and wrote what the Harbinger calls a very spirited letter. It remains to be seen whether Lord Ellenborough will force the Resident at Moulaich to resign. The Resident had last year applied for leave to go home, which was refused. The question therefore is whether a Governor-General will not allow an officer to go home when he will—has a right—he has always the power—to make him go home when he would not.

—We copy from the Harbinger an account of Lord Ellenborough's festivities at Ferozepore.

—Mr. Montague continues his lectures on Political Economy at the Mechanics' Institute. In his last lecture, he dissected the Zemindary system, and demonstrated that it was vitally inimical to the interests of the Agricultural classes. We were not informed how many were present at this session. We hope the learned lecturer will be induced to publish this lecture; the Landholder's Association will of course be at the expense of the impression.

—Letters from Ferozepore state, that it is the Governor-General's intention to erect a fort at that station—where it is not needed—to be called Fort Ellenborough, in which two columns are to be erected as memorials of the Afghan campaign, the one inscribed with all the battles fought and won, and the other with the names of all the officers who fell. This report smacks incredible. It is utterly impossible that, a Nukundah who found fault publicly with the extravagance of his predecessor can intend to outdo him in expense. It is incredible that while a Finance Committee is sitting to save the shillings and pence, by curtailing allowances and shoddy offices, the Governor-General can dream of an expensive fort, which will absorb half a million sterling.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 6.

—We have much pleasure in publishing the Address presented to Col. Low, late Resident at Lucknow, by the European officers of the station, on the occasion of his quitting office. It returns to Europe. Col. Low's public services have received, as they deserved, the meed of praise from his public employers; the present address is a tribute of respect and esteem from those who have witnessed his private liberality, both pecuniary and social.

His departure will be a great loss to the society at the station, and will not be easily made up by his successor though decorated with the title of Barony.

—Accounts from the scene of hostilities in Bundelkand, dated the 24th December, appear in this morning's Englisman, from which we learn that Reports of the ex-Raja and his insurgents being in the neighbourhood of the encampment had been spread abroad repeatedly; but though parties had been sent out, not the soul, or a body of men, was to be seen. The country appears perfectly quiet, and the cultivators are looking after their fields, totally unconscious of the rebellion, which is supposed to exist in the province.

—The Englisman says there was a good reason for the late of Shere on the 24th of December, by the army assembled at Ferozepore. He says, of course on the authority of a letter, that Shere Singh was expected on the 24th—to keep ward soldier-like style. The Proclamation has been called into memory by way of comparison with Shere Singh will not cross the Sutledge if for other reasons, at least because there is no bridge and Sir Charles Napier, who are equally singular over it. The Harbinger seems better informed of these matters. It says, it is thought that the bridge of boats, which was swept away the day after General Nott had crossed, disappeared by design rather than by accident; and that the absence of the bridge was advantageous, in saving Lord Ellenborough from the necessity of executing some threat which in his wrath he had uttered against Shere Singh.

—The unfortunate Shahpore, whom General Pollock left on the throne of Cabul, is now a fugitive at Peshawar. Mahomed Akber is supreme at Cabul. Zeman Khan is Governor of Jellalabad, Shumsooddeen of Ghazni, and Sultan Jan of Candahar. Every thing is reverting to the old state of things as it was before we entered the country. —The First Per Cent. Loan is closed; and the four per cent. loan is opened again, to which no body will subscribe.

—We are happy to learn that the Parental Academy has got rid of all its debt, and will begin the year, as the Harbinger tells us, with the prospect of improvement. It is pleasing to find that there are any sure prospects for the year 1845. But it is satisfactory to hear that Dr. Duff and Dewan Ram Koomal Sen have undertaken the task of remodelling the Institution, so as to accommodate it to the circumstances of the country.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7.

—It is now stated that Col. Shelton's Corps Martial will take place at Ludlow, as the Governor-General was to leave Ferozepore on the 24th or 25th of January. The information elicited on his trial and that of Major Pitt Rivers, will go far to elucidate the hitherto mysterious history of the events which transpired at Cabul, between the 2d of Nov. and the 7th January.

—The relief of the Army, which has been looked for with much anxiety, is at length made public. —The Army assembled at Ferozepore, which entered the battle of Museen on the 20th, was not to rehearse the battle of Salamance on the 20th, which broke it to fight over again on the 31st.

—Sir George Arthur has given a grand fete at Baulley, in honour of the viceroys of Anglo-China and the peace in China. In the course of his speech, he eulogized Lord Ellenborough's conduct in reference to the expedition to China; for doubts having arisen as to the interpretation of a certain despatch from England, and which would have caused much delay by a reference to the Home Authorities, Lord Ellenborough took on himself to interpret it, and, we say, now, if you succeed, the glory will be yours; but if you fail, the responsibility shall be mine. In another part of his speech Sir Arthur is somewhat ambiguous. He said, "Every gentleman present was aware of the difficulties in which India had been placed, at the period of the arrival of the present Governor-General. They all know its present situation, and how much was due to the Noble Lord who had taken such special care to equip the troops under General Halliday and Sir George Arthur." If the Governor alludes to Lord Auckland, he is perfectly right; if to the present Governor-General, his assertion will require to be qualified in no small degree. We have not to learn what efforts were made to equip General Pollock for the march, and why, if they were made, they were so unsuccessful, that five months after Lord Ellenborough's arrival, the General was obliged to advance to Cabul in a state of unexampled destitution of all the necessary things.

We learn from the Harbinger that the Honorable the Governor-General has fixed on Saturday the 14th at 11 o'clock to preside at the distribution of the prizes at the Hargreave College, which were earned at the last half year's examination.

—We copy from the Body Times the Proclamation issued fifteen years ago by Sir Lionel Smith at Poona, so remarkable for its straight forward soldier-like style. The Proclamation has been called into memory by way of comparison with Shere Singh will not cross the Sutledge if for other reasons, at least because there is no bridge and Sir Charles Napier, who are equally singular over it. The Harbinger seems better informed of these

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

PRELUDING IN MINISTERS.—We have no doubt the attention of our readers will have been attracted strongly and judiciously by the letter which appeared in our last number from Calcutta. We repeat, it is written by a gentleman of the first name and reputation in that city, and it is consequently that the representations which it contains (they indeed too much speak for themselves) are entitled to every credit and consideration.

On any man rarely acquainted with the Gospel of Christ fail to mourn with the deepest lamentation over such a working, as is there exposed, of the Christian leaves! Apparently, the only missionaries there of the Society for Propagating the Gospel can labour with in India, are those of idolatrous Rome, while they teach the converts of all other denominations of Christians that they are being deluded, as by Etnio and Mahomedan, so by those who have nominally, but falsely, converted them to the faith of Christ! What true Christian does not loathe this accursed spirit of Treachery, and have even the least leaves of it! Where admitted at all, its sure tendency is to leave the whole lump.

The Purveyance among the officers and labourers of the Society for Propagating the Gospel should never have had such sources from which they sprang at home. And in this connection, we particularly call the attention of our readers to the following letter. They must judge for themselves whether the Government at home and the streams abroad are not of the same quality and flavour; and to what length the men at home are likely to proceed in privacy, when in public they profess in the style circulated in the Rev. Mr. La Trobe's letter, it is perhaps not very difficult to imagine. The Rev. Gentleman says:—

TO THE SOCIETY OF THE LANCET.

Sir,—At a Meeting lately held for the purpose of forming an Association in aid of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts in this town, the names of the Society were presented to the Committee. I have no objection, for my own part, as I should be happy in any way to assist the cause of missions. Certain papers have in consequence been forwarded to me, with the request that I would direct, but these amongst my people. On looking over them, I found a tract entitled Dialogues on Church Missions, which I read, without suspecting that I should meet with anything so inconsistent with the character of the Church of England good society. I was much surprised and grieved, therefore, to find a number of the errors of the tract, and I would direct, I would allow in a dialogue, where two old women and a village schoolmaster of no great acquirements formed the dramatic persons. The question is asked: "What are missionaries?" At the answer it is "Gentlemen sent out by the Church to preach the Gospel in foreign lands." (1 Diad., p. 11,) thereby implying a denial of that honoured title to many of the most eminent of God's servants, who have laboured, with multiplied tokens of Divine blessing, in the Missionary field, but who had not been sent out by the Church. Again, in 1 Diad., p. 8, "right sort of ministers" is defined to be "clergymen ordained by the Bishops;" implying, that all who have not been Episcopally ordained are wrong sort of ministers, and that, if ordained, whatever may be their qualifications in other respects, they are "right sort of ministers." These "right sort of ministers" again, seem to be sent out to reverse the order of the Divine commission, to preach the Gospel and baptize, and then to say, "They go to baptize and preach."—2 Diad., p. 7.

Nothing is said of the nature of human depravity, of the necessity of a spiritual regeneration of the Gospel, of the true character of the Church of England, or of the fruits of the Spirit, which evince the reality of that change. It would appear as if all depended upon saying baptism and made the Church of England, but the peculiar impurities of Episcopacy is stated to be, their being "born in a land where we have good clergymen, and where we can enjoy all the great benefits of the Church."—3 Diad., p. 18.

I might adduce other examples of the treachery of the teaching of this tract, but so much may serve. Having ascertained from one of the Secretaries of the Parent Society that the Dialogues were put forth for distribution with the sanction of the Society, I thought it a duty to draw the attention, especially of my clerical brethren, to the character of the tract. But being myself prepared to further views and sentiments subversive alike of Scripture truth and the principles of the Reformation, thankful at the same time that there is a Church Missionary Society, with which the clergy may co-operate without mingling in the extravagances of the Trinitarian school, I went to beg the withdrawal of my name from the Committee.

Throughout the tract, the term, the Church, as respects this country, seems confined to the Church of England.

Most happy shall I be at any future time to assist the Society when it shall have recovered itself out of what must be considered, a state of the devil, to participate in its efforts in the Christian cause.

If the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel be formed solely to baptize and make Christians, "it will be to Episcopally ordained is all that is needed to constitute its ministers 'right sort of ministers,' and if for the furtherance of its work 'all it wants money.' (1 Diad., p. 10.)—what is it better than its sister Society of the same name in the Roman Church! Ministers may be obtained—priests may be made—multitudes may be baptized and made Christians—a nominal Church may spring up with the external ornaments of a Church, but the Spirit will be wanting. Not by such means, or by such men, will the wilderness blossom like the rose. And while, with all the pomp and circumstance of a Church, there will be nothing but barrenness, many a spot where some humble follower of Jesus is sowing in the Master's spirit, and with his Master's commission, though despised by some as "no right sort of ministers,"—many such a spot will be sown by its fruits to be a field which the Lord hath blessed.

Kendal, Sept. 26, 1841.

THE ASSASSINATION OF YORK.—On Sunday last, His Grace presided in the chapel at Bishopsthorpe, to a numerous congregation, the chapel being filled, as it was understood to be the last sermon the Archbishop delivered in person, in consequence of his very advanced age, having, on Monday last, completed his 85th year. The text was most appropriate: "The night cometh, when no man can work;" from which the venerable Bishop delivered a most impressive and truly eloquent discourse, in a clear, distinct, and forcible manner; which was listened to most attentively, and caused to be long remembered by all who had the gratification of being present.—Yorkshireman.

STRAZOR MOVEMENT.—The New York Observer states, that one of the Roman Catholic parishes in New York, has recently elected to the appointment of a Curate made by the Bishop, and that a correspondence has been opened, from which interesting results may be expected. The levity of the Churchwardens breathes a spirit of desecrating insinuations to the Pope.—Fat.

CHURCH MISSIONS.—The Abbe Jean Marie de Lamour, (see the same Journal) has just arrived at Calcutta, with a large number of his brethren, who are to embark in that harbour for the French West India Islands. Two others are shortly to depart for Calcutta. The French missionaries, it is said, who are now slowly preparing, the way for the emancipation of the slaves in our country, is most fully.—Record.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, backed by a considerable number of the free-trade party at his own instigation, has resolved on proposing for its consideration, and, it can be said, adoption, the principle of a free duty, and in order not only to justice Lord John Russell, but to understand him in the market of national popularity, to fix that duty at least, by two shillings a quarter, then was proposed by his Liberal predecessor, in other words, Sir Robert Peel means to propose a six-shilling free duty on wheat!—Hunts Independent.

LEGAT CALCUTTA.—It is rumoured in legal circles, that in consequence of the declining state of his health, the veteran Lord Lyndhurst will shortly retire from the woolsack, which his brilliant talents have so powerfully adorned, and that he will be succeeded by Mr. Lord Alington, now Lord Chief Justice, who will shortly afterwards retire in favour of Sir William Follett. These changes will involve the elevation of the present Attorney-General to the dignity of Chief Baron, and in all probability, the promotion of Mr. Fitzroy Kelly and Mr. Cranwell Cresswell.—Bristol.

and general health to a population preserved from the process of such special diseases, and which, by the means of moral influences, and the effects of education are more transient than with a healthy population.

That these adverse circumstances tend to produce an adult population short-lived, improvident, reckless, and intemperate, and with habitual avidity for sensual gratification.

That these habits lead to the abandonment of all the necessities and decencies of life, and especially lead to the overcrowding of their homes, which is destructive to the morality as well as the health of large numbers of both sexes.

That defective town-cleaning fosters habits of the most squalid degradation, and tends to the demoralization of large numbers of the population, who submit by means of what they find amidst the squalid filth accumulated in neglected streets and by-places.

That the expenses of local public works are in general unequally and unfairly assessed, oppressively and uneconomically collected by separate collections variously applied in separate and inefficient operations, and by undisciplined and practically irresponsible officers.

That the existing law for the protection of the public health and the conventional machinery for reclaiming its execution, such as the courts law, have fallen into disuse, and are in the state of being the prevalence of the evils they were intended to prevent.

Secondly. As to the means by which the present sanitary condition of the labouring classes may be improved.

The primary and most important measure, and at the same time the most practicable, and within the recognised province of public administration, are drainage, the removal of all refuse of habitations, streets and roads, and the improvement of the supplies of water.

That the chief obstacles to the immediate removal of decomposing refuse of towns and habitations have been expense and annoyance of the land labour and cartage requisite to be performed.

That this expense may be reduced to one-twentieth or to one-thirtieth, or reduced inconsiderable by the use of water and self-acting means of removal by improved and cheaper sewers and drains.

That refuse, when thus held in suspension, may be most cheaply and innocently conveyed by any distance out of towns, and also in the best forms for productive use, and also in the least injury by the pollution of natural streams can be avoided.

That for all these purposes, as well as for domestic use, better supplies of water are absolutely necessary.

That for successful drainage, the state of the topography of geological strata be the basis of operations is requisite.

That appropriate scientific arrangements for public drainage would afford important facilities for inland drainage, which is important for the health as well as sustenance of the labouring classes.

That the expense of public drainage of supplies of water laid on in houses, and of means of improved cleansing, would by a pecuniary gain, by diminishing the existing charges attendant on sickness and premature mortality.

That for the protection of the labouring classes and of the rate-payers against the inefficiency and waste in all new structural arrangements for the protection of the public health, and to ensure public confidence that the expenditure will be beneficial, securities should be taken that all new local public works are devised and conducted by responsible officers qualified by the possession of the science and skill of civil engineers.

That the oppressiveness and injustice of laws for the whole immediate outlay on such works upon persons who have only a small share in the liability, may be avoided by care in spreading the expense over periods coincident with the benefits.

That, by appropriate arrangements, two or fifteen per cent. on the ordinary outlay for drainage might be saved which on an estimate of the expense of the necessary structural alterations of one-third only of the existing tenements, would be a saving of one million and a half sterling, besides the reduction of the future expense of management.

That for the prevention of the disease occasioned by defective ventilation, and other causes of impurity in places of work and other places where large numbers are assembled, and for the general promotion of the means necessary to the health of the population, the economy to appoint a district medical officer, good friend of private practice, and with the securities of special qualifications and responsibilities to initiate sanitary measures, and regulate the execution of law.

That, by the combination of all these arrangements, it is probable that the full ensurable period of life is gained by the French labourer; that is, an increase of thirteen years at least, may be extended to the whole of the labouring class.

That the attainment of these and the other collateral advantages of reform in the sanitary arrangements, are within the power of the Legislature, and are dependent mainly on the security taken for the application of practical science, skill, and economy in the direction of local public works.

And that the removal of noxious physical circumstances, and the promotion of civil, household, and personal cleanliness, are necessary to the improvement of the moral condition of the population: for that sound morality and refinement in manners and health cannot exist long, or co-exist with filthy habits and uncleanly ways of the consumption of food.

FRANCE.—In the Paris Papers, the letter of Lord Aberdeen to the Lords of the Admiralty, on the subject of war, is published by our writers on the coast of Africa, is the principal matter referred to. The National regards it as a piece of hypocrisy, throws out for the purpose of wheeling the French Government to the right of the right of the French.

The Courier Français says, that on Lord Aberdeen's own showing, Great Britain is bound by every law, human and divine, to make restitution to all who had, by the exercise of that right, suffered in their property.

The Commerce says, that, when asked to concur in the renewal of the Treaty which gave to England that right, M. De St. Arnauld may now boldly present himself to Lord Aberdeen, and, with His Lordship's letter in his hand, demand the abrogation of the Treaty of 1831 and 1832.

In their campaign against M. Guizot, and their clamours against England, the French Journals have found, we must say, every assistance from Lord Aberdeen, Lord Ashburton, and Tory diplomatists in France. The abandonment of all claim for obtaining the right of search from the Americans, by Lord Ashburton, gave the foe of M. Guizot such increased force, that he, it seems, abandons all idea of feeling the force of the American Treaty, and now comes before the public an official letter of Lord Aberdeen's, according to the Admiralty of having sent out naval instructions, and having directed the aid of warlike officers for putting down the Slave-trade in a course of illegality and violence.

According to a letter written by M. Schaefer to the Paris Globe on the subject of the anti-slavery cause, Lord Aberdeen, the Tory Ministers, Lord Ashburton but followed Lord Stanley's views and spirit, especially in giving France the handle so much desired, of renegeing the Slave-trade.

FRANCE.—PARIS, OCT. 13.—GREAT and important news! The Bishop of Algiers has left his capital accompanied by three priests. On his arrival at Toulon he was joined by two other ecclesiastics, and all proceeded in the same carriage drawn by six horses to Paris in Italy. On returning to Toulon they will find a Government vessel awaiting their orders. Now can you conceive what is the purpose of all these costs and of this great mission? Why, the Bishop of Algiers comes from Africa to Europe, and a carriage and a ship are placed at his disposal to convey a home one of the Fathers of the Church—St. Augustine! Now this may be all very well understood, so far as the Bishop is concerned; it is to him that he owes his episcopate, his bishopric, but what has the French Government to do with it? How can such an expense be justified? Will it be by the Catholic, apostolic, and Roman faith of those who rule over us? Alas! not so; for they have just placed at the disposal of Mussulman another vessel to proceed from Algiers to Morocco. It is then no more than one of those acts of attention which is considered right to show to the particular religion, which sways each country. But then it does not appear to be perceived that these attentions also towards all religious denominations, prove that they give, thereby setting the example of unbelief, which, coming from those in power, is doubly pernicious; for where the lower orders of society are the great great religion with such indifference, they in turn imitate them, and have masters of faith to children.

Our Government is severely censured, but without show or noise, about the colonization of Algeria, and the way in which it proceeds will show that it is endeavoring to act in this matter without awakening the attention of the French people. It is now about a year since that a Commission was appointed to draw up a plan for colonizing that country. Within the last few months their labours were known to be nearly completed, and yet nothing was published. And it might be supposed that there were hardly any documents entered into the hands of the Chamber. In fact, one of the Opposition parties known to be always on the look out for Ministerial blunders, remarked that the Commission had not publicly made known that it existed.

And yet steps were taken in Algeria to create several very important establishments. This called forth an answer from a Ministerial paper, which is tantamount to an avowal. It justified the measures taken, and the mission by the impossibility which it found to hold a final meeting, and explains the haste of the Government to act owing to the urgency there is to forward affairs which are suffering in that colony. I think it may have been more exact to say that a publicity was decreed which would have called forth the interminable polemics of the French journals, and have roused the jealous attention of England. Be that as it may, an ordinance of the most important and significant character hitherto promulgated, relating to our possessions in the north of Africa, has just appeared.

Until now justice had been administered there by tribunals nearly independent of those of France, and of a kind almost exceptional. Therefore a good deal was left to military authority: a certain tolerance was shown the French to shut their eyes to the claims of the Jewish and Mussulman authorities, who, as far as they could, retained the forms and traditions of the past. Indeed a French court of justice was left for the Mussulman judges, and of their co-religionaries were tried. But the new ordinance has greatly changed or limited all this. It withdraws all authority from the tribunals, and no longer go beyond the narrow circle of ecclesiastical discipline, and will be incompetent to decide the most trivial offences, coming within the jurisdiction of the French tribunals. The ordinance is also but little favorable to the Mussulman; it leaves to the Cadi to decide questions between persons of their own nation; but one in which the ordinance is concerned must be brought before the French tribunals. Formerly, as I have already informed you, an equal number of Mussulman judges to that of the French was allowed, even in criminal cases, but they were wholly excluded, no exception being made if the relations of a native-African judge can only assist in affairs of simple interest; for instance, in the commercial court, and there even could not be one in the civil court, and a consulting voice allowed him. You see, then, that a shadow of the past is alone left, and the object is to enforce slowly but surely all traces of it.

On the other hand, the claims of the French tribunals in Algeria are restrained by the same ordinance. I do not now enter into any details, but it will suffice for you to know that new ties are established with the judicial system of France, and that is another sign of the assimilation which is proposed to attain of the colony to the mother country.

What proceeds leads me naturally to speak of the general returns of criminals for criminal and other offences, which has just been published for the year 1840. If dependence can be placed on statistical results, this return is very lamentable. It shows a sensible increase in the number of crimes beyond those of the preceding year. If this increase had only happened during that year, 1840, it might have been thought to be accidental, and to be accounted for by some particular and passing cause. But such is not the case; this increase during the abovementioned year is but a link of a chain of crimes always being looked several years past, the reason therefore must be looked for in the actual state of things, and perhaps this state is the effect of the state of the country in 1830. I am a sincere admirer of that Revolution which was the cause of the fall of the throne of France, but I cannot help drawing a conclusion which is in its favour every experience of truth. It is not, however, the fact itself I wish to call your attention, but rather to the manner in which it is appreciated by our most distinguished public writers.

Under the Restoration, which favoured the Roman clergy, who in turn encouraged ignorance, the cry from every part of the Liberal camp was, that the source of all the evils of society arose from this ignorance, and the extensive and systematic diffusion of it. Depin on the intellectual state of France must have been a great calamity. Now, when crimes increase in number and enormity, it is pretended that it does not proceed from ignorance, but from the knowledge of the rights of men, people since 1830. It is also asserted that crime has increased since the increase of schools! And, further, that the cause of the increase of crime is the Restoration, maintained the cause of the increase of crime, Dupin himself, the author of the statistical publication on behalf of science, is now writing against the diffusion of knowledge, and the cause of crime is said to be in little esteem, namely, the sentence of religion to murder the people. You see it is always the same story, religion is wanted for crimes, forever one-sided and self.

Undoubtedly religion is the necessary remedy for this evil as well as for every other, but religion is not the clergy, true and efficacious religion is not that which improves by means of the house of St. Augustine, and yet this is what we are offered to revere France! I have lately myself seen marvellous effects produced on prisoners by a very simple remedy, and I add, Evangelical faith, and all the efforts of those who had the direction of the prison tended to still its blessed effect! But I will reserve this subject for another letter, and after the general and recent of my present communication, I hope in my next to rejoice you in regard to our little point at least.—From the Correspondent of the Record.

ALGERIA.—In regard to the colonization of Algeria, a morning contemporary has the following remarks:—

Paris journals have been crying out to Marshal Soult and M. Guizot why they do not colonize Algeria. They might have replied, that the French are too fond of towns, and in general too comfortable at home, to go and drain the marshes of Algeria, under the fire of the Arabs. The French have now possessed Algeria twelve years; there are 40,000 French souls in the colony, and these need 80,000 soldiers and eighty millions of francs each year to protect and feed them. The object of the emigrants thither is to get their share of the riches which, as contractors, sutlers, brokers, and vendors. The 40,000 French are the followers of a camp, not colonists of a country. Desiring of France to colonize the Ministry had turned its views to Switzerland, and hoped to entice some settlers from that happy and agricultural, and at the same time wealthy, province. Now, however, Algeria has hit upon a plan for satisfying the passions of Algeria. He is going to locate the monks of La Trappe in Algeria. The poor Trappists have been so examined against in France, that they quitted it; but now are to have remuneration in Algeria. The Parisian Globe informs us that the Superior of the order went to General Bugeaud, and the General told him, "But Sir, the sword first, and the cross after." We fear that this conversion of a war of razee or glazee, as the General calls them, into a crusade, will rather encourage the Arabs than succumb to subordination. For our part we have compassion both for the Arab and the Trappist, equally the victims of the French thirst of what they call civilization. But, indeed, we are not so sure that the old soldier so doubt considers the shipment of the Trappists to Africa as an excellent joke. If he could not send Corsica, and Republicans, and newspaper editors at the same time, and thus get rid of the pests of the empire at once, he no doubt would consider it as a magnificent achievement.—Record.

HOLLAND.—The King of Holland opened the session of the States General at the Hague on Monday. His speech gives on the whole as favourable a picture of the state of the Dutch people as could be drawn by any other in Europe at the present time. Nevertheless, the revenue has fallen off, and an increase in the duties on inheritance and stamps is proposed to make up the deficiency. Economy is promised. Education is said to be advancing satisfactorily. A new poor-law and a new tariff are in contemplation.—Pat. 24th October.

DENMARK.—A letter from Copenhagen states, that a peasant of Roskilde, in the island of Zealand, while ploughing, discovered two gold urns, filled with ashes, chased with foliage and fruits, and bearing on the top of the cover a figure of Odin, the Jupiter of the Scandinavians. This figure is represented standing, bearing on one shoulder the two gods Ullar (Thor) and Munia (Memory); and at its feet two wolves, symbols of its power. These urns are especially alive, in good preservation, and are carefully guarded. The gold is exceedingly fine, except at the edges. They are about six inches in diameter and nine inches in height, comprising the neck not the figure, and their weight is little more than the pound. The peasant delivered them to the Government, which paid him the value of the gold, and ordered them to be deposited in the Museum of Copenhagen. They are supposed to belong to the Christian era.—Record.

EGYPT.—We find in the Semaphore Maritime of the 25th inst. an important notice from the Chamber of Commerce of that city, informing the merchants that, on the invitation of the Consul-General of France at Alexandria, the Chamber of Egypt had ordered that all masts of goods forwarded in trust between Suez and Alexandria would, without distinction of country, be liable to pass freely on the mere declaration of their contents, accompanied by an invoice. The duty to be levied on those goods was fixed at one half per cent. ad valorem. This decision of M. Belmont Ali was confirmed by the Chamber of Commerce by the Minister of Commerce and Agriculture in a letter of the 17th inst.—Pat.

AMERICA.—An Expedition, it was stated, was fitting out at Vera Cruz, for the purpose of which was California, Texas. Troops were collecting in the neighbourhood to form the military part of the Expedition. The iron war-steamer the Goodnow was at Vera Cruz, preparing to sail for California, for the purpose of reconnoitering the island and capturing any Texas vessels she might fall in with, previous to the sailing of the Expedition for the invasion of Texas by sea. Meanwhile, a Mexican force of 1,300 men, under the command of General Waj, had invaded Texas by land. On the 11th ult. they completely surprised San Antonio. 53 of the principal citizens were taken. The Circuit Court was in session, and the Judge and officers of the Court were made prisoners by the Mexicans. The President of Texas had revoked the blockade of the ports of Mexico, in order to allow a more favourable opportunity for the mediation of England and the United States.

The operation of the new tariff had quite crippled the trade with England at New York. Large quantities of goods being daily transhipped to this country on account of its poverty. Business was unusually dull. As in England so in America, discussion in the press on the advantage or otherwise of free trade as opposed to "protection" to native industry, were of daily occurrence.—Pat. 31st Oct.

As the members of the present Christian Community at Lucknow form but a small portion of Colonel Low's friends, and there are many in different parts of India who would gladly avail themselves of any opportunity of showing the estimation in which he is held by them, the Committee appointed by the subscribers at Lucknow beg to circulate their information of the purpose which was generally approved of by the Lucknow Community, and to assure those who may wish to subscribe, that they will have much pleasure in receiving their contributions to the Fund.

To the Community at Lucknow.
As Lieut. Colonel Low, C.B. Resident at Lucknow is about to leave India, it is proposed that a subscription should be opened for the purpose of obtaining a Portrait of him to be executed by George Becherer, Esq. and kept in the Banquetting Room at Lucknow, in order to perpetuate the recollection of the many virtues which have adorned his public and private character, that have caused him to be universally esteemed and respected, and have enabled him to conduct the great question of every one who has had the happiness of knowing him.

Persons desirous of subscribing are requested to put down their names with the amount of their contributions, and to vote for the Committee who will prepare and present an Address to Colonel Low, C.B. previous to his departure.

In accordance with the above proposal a Committee was formed, at Lucknow, and an Address presented—and although before Col. Low's departure it was impossible to ascertain the probable amount of subscriptions, Mr. Becherer very handsomely undertook to paint the picture.

By order of the Committee,
Lucknow, 29th Dec. 1842. J. SPENCER LONIE, Secretary.

6 EUROPEAN AND ORIENTAL AGENCY.

MR. PARKE PITTAR

HAVING arranged the formation of an Agency, the particular object of which will be the transacting of all business connected with India and Europe, begs to offer his services to the community of India, in any way that can be rendered 411 available.

A regular and important feature in the Agency now established, will consist in the annual return of Mr. P. Pittar to India. Taking advantage of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Steam

412 the purpose of visiting Calcutta about the latter end of every October, and returning to Europe about the middle of the following February, thus affording to persons entrusting the management of their affairs to his care, the opportunity

413 of a personal conference and explanation of their views and intentions,—an advantage in the transaction of affairs of a complicated delicate or family nature, the greatness of which need not be

414 commented upon.

A long residence in India, combined with an intimate knowledge of almost every description of manufactured article, and his various manufactures, rendering him peculiarly fitted for the office of Agent to persons procuring their supplies or other

415 articles, such as Table Equipments, Philosophical Apparatus, Musical Instruments, Military Equipments, Wines, &c., &c., direct from England or the Continent, he offers them his services with every confidence that his selection will give the 416 most perfect satisfaction, whether as regarding quality, cheapness, or adaptation to the climate; but in the execution of these commissions, a previous remittance for each full amount, or reference for payment, will invariably be required.

417 Every article purchased through this Agency will be most minutely examined previous to its being packed, and the same extra under every 418 circumstance, taken, as if persons were themselves individually present and superintending.

419 Packages of a large size will, as usual, be shipped by sea—smaller ones, by land, and in those

420 of smaller dimensions, will, (unless otherwise instructed,) be sent through the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Office, Oriented: thus enabling persons to have the advantage of the 421 commission of 5 per cent. on the gross amount so charged.

422 Mr. P. Pittar has taken his passage in the Indie Steamer, to sail on the 10th February, for Seas and, therefore, requests for the present, that all letters intended for him may be directed to his residence, No. 36, Dispersal, Calcutta; but after their departure, to the address of Mr. P. PARKE PITTAR, Esq. at ORIENTAL AGENCY, Oversea, London, where they will meet with the most prompt attention.

PEARL DENTIFRICE.

A WHITE POWDER, of Oriental Herbs of the most delightful fragrance. It eradicates Tartar and decayed Spots from the Teeth, preserves the Enamel, and gives the Teeth purity in their sockets, rendering them delicately White. Being an Anti-Scorbutic, it eradicates the Scourvy from the Gums, strengthens, braces, and renders them of a healthy red; it removes unpleasant tastes from the mouth, which often remain after severe, taking medicine, &c. and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath.

Price 2s. 6d. per box, duty included.

NOTICE.—The Name and Address of the Proprietors, A. ROWLAND & SON, 20, HATTON GARDEN, LONDON, are engraved on the Government Stamp, which is pasted on the "Karyoon" and is frequently pressed upon the wrapper in which the Karyoon is enclosed.

Beware of COUNTERFEITS!—composed of the most pernicious and trashy ingredients, and which are frequently pressed upon the wrapper under the lure of being cheap.

Be sure to ask for "ROWLAND'S" Articles. Sold by every PATHEMAN and MEDICINE VENDOR throughout the civilized world.

The following Testimonial is one of many thousands addressed to Messrs. Rowland & Son, 20, Hatton Garden, London.

The Decay of the Teeth and Gums arises from various causes; but, principally, it may be attributed to early weeping, ill health and the use of Tooth Powders containing salivary and other deleterious acids, which give a momentary whiteness to the teeth, while they corrode the enamel!—The extreme prevalence of this last cause is too well known to need comment. To this prevalent cause, we principally attribute the Royal Botanical Garden, which was happily terminated by the most illustrious discovery ever given to the world for the preservation of the Teeth, and the Enamel, viz., ROWLAND'S ODNTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE; this Powder now occupies a distinguished place at the Toilet of the Bourgeois and the Nobility throughout Europe, and is the general demand for it at once announces the favour in which it is held by the public at large.

CHINA.—The intelligence which has just been received from China, extending to the 6th of December, is highly important. Sir Henry Pottinger has ascertained, that no fewer than 120 hundred and eighty-three of the unfortunate individuals, chiefly natives of India, who were on board the Nerbudda and the Aur, when they were wrecked on the island of Formosa, have been put to death in cold blood by the Chinese authorities. They had falsely represented to the Emperor, that both the vessels had gone to the island with hostile intentions; and that the prisoners were captured in battle; and they allege that these flagitious murders were perpetrated in obedience to the Imperial commands. Sir Henry Pottinger, in his Proclamation, declares his intention respectfully, but firmly, to represent the real facts of the case to the Emperor, and to demand that the local authorities on the island shall be degraded, and brought to condign punishment, and that their property shall be confiscated, and paid over to the officers of the British Government, for the relief of the families of the innocent men who have thus been put to death. The Plenipotentiary further declares, that without this atonement, he is not prepared to say that this event will not occasion a serious misunderstanding, or that it may not even lead to a renewal of hostilities, between the two countries.

It is most gratifying to find the Plenipotentiary at once assume so firm a tone on this occasion; and there can be no doubt that his representations to the Cabinet of Peking will procure immediate and ample redress. The threat of a renewal of hostilities, the first result of which would be to level the capital of Formosa with the ground, may be expected to produce an almost magical effect on the fears of the Emperor, and to elicit an Imperial Edict for the condign punishment of the guilty, which shall be conveyed at the rate of 600 le a day. Sir Henry Pottinger has the right acted wisely in stating so distinctly that the authorities on the island had deceived His Majesty; for although the capture of the men in open warfare would have afforded no excuse for the truculent order of the Emperor, the deception which has been practiced will afford him an opportunity of making the most ample atonement, without any apparent sacrifice of dignity. This decisive conduct of the Plenipotentiary will be found to exert the most happy influence on our future intercourse with the Chinese. The punishment of the offenders will tend to give general security to all Europeans, who may visit any part of the coast, or who may be thrown upon it by accident. The prompt and energetic representation now sent to Peking, will convince the Emperor and his Ministers, that no injustice or violence towards the subjects of the British Crown will be suffered with impunity, and that if redress is not obtained when respectfully demanded, it will be exacted at the cannon's mouth.

Sir Henry Pottinger, who arrived at Hong Kong in the beginning of December, intended to return immediately to the North, to demand redress for the murder of these unfortunate victims. The Chinese will thus perceive that he is in earnest and not to be trifled with. The Imperial Commissioners, who were on their way to Canton to open commercial negotiations, will discover on their arrival, that the British Minister is resolved not to enter on these discussions till full reparation has been obtained for the massacre, and that he is already at Chusan, demanding the condign punishment of the offenders. The effect of this promptitude and decision, on the minds of those high officers of the Empire and the great body of the people, will be most salutary. They will thus be made to feel that while the English are ready and even anxious to enter into the largest commercial transactions, they have now a political character to support, and various resources at their command, and will allow no insult or injury to pass unpunished.

The papers now received contain two publications of the Imperial Will; the one, dated the 6th of September, gives the various items concerning the "settlement of affairs" with the barbarians, which have received the "affix of the Imperial seal." It appears that the High Commissioners have very patriotically requested, that the greatest punishment may be inflicted on them for their concessions to the English, and that the Emperor has graciously acquitted them of all guilt. The indemnity of twenty-one millions, the Emperor declares to be a vast amount, and asks with great naïveté where such a sum is to come from. But the matter is settled at once, by making the Minister Ye King alone responsible for arranging the matter, and registering the places which are to furnish it. The peace, however, is evidently a subject of gratification with his Majesty, and he declares that as it has now been concluded, "the people of both nations are to be regarded as one mutual whole." He is evidently anxious that the pacification directed to give "the closest attention to the minutest particulars, that the treaty may be drawn up in the most clear and intelligible terms, to prevent all difficulties and confusion of affairs." Relative to the claims on the Hong Merchants, the proclamation of the 6th Sept. states, that as to the old debts, the foreigners will not dare to seek the interference of the officers of Government. In a subsequent proclamation, however, dated the 30th of September, it appears that the Imperial Government has acknowledged these claims, evidently in addition to the sum which was stipulated to be paid by the treaty of Nankin; for the first article states, that "the Chinese Government will at present be responsible for the Hong Merchants paying to their English creditors, relative to the amount of Two Millions of dollars. Hereafter Hong Merchants and all other classes of natives are to be alone responsible for their own debts, the Mandarins affording only their official aid."

COOLY EMIGRATION.—The despatch of Coolies to the Mauritius has commenced under the operation of the Act, and it is reported that arrangements are in progress for sending six or seven thousand thither before the close of the present monsoon. The nature of these arrangements has not been recorded by any of our contemporaries, and the public is therefore without the means of comparing the new system of emigration, with that which was put down by law, or of determining how far it is likely to be effectual in permanently checking the growth of abuses. It was generally understood, that the system proposed by the Ministry at home provided that the Emigration Agent of the Mauritius in Calcutta and the other ports should engage and despatch laborers for the island, who should be at liberty on their arrival to hire themselves to the planters; that the treasury of the island should be charged with their passage-money; and that the Government of India, should appoint Protectors at the different ports, to watch over the emigration, and prevent the violation of the laws. We now learn that the coolies are engaged, as they were under the old system, by mercantile firms in Calcutta and that the vessels employed in transporting the laborers are chartered by them. It is desirable to know what motives could induce Houses of business in Calcutta, to give up their time to the gratuitous promotion of the system. If they are to be remunerated for their labour, it is desirable that the amount and the mode of that remuneration should be known. If they are to be paid so much a head by the Government of the Mauritius for every Cooly they land, the nature of the speculation is easily understood. If they are acting as Agents for particular planters on the island, the question naturally occurs how are those planters to be repaid, when they can possibly make no claim on the labor of the emigrants after their arrival?

One of the first vessels employed in conveying laborers has been detected in a notorious attempt to violate the law, and to embark a greater number than the Act permits. It is somewhat singular that a procedure, which fixes so deep a moral stigma on all who were engaged in it, should not have been repudiated by the Commander of the vessel, or the Home Agency by which the vessel was chartered. If the attempt to smuggle these additional laborers was made without the cognizance of the Captain and the consigners of the vessel, a sense of honour should have led them to explain a circumstance so discreditable. If the attempt was made—which we can scarcely credit,—with their knowledge, we have clear evidence of the kind of morality which this system is calculated to foster. There can be little doubt that the attempt will be repeated. Indeed, we find from the Englishman, that an effort has been made, and perhaps with success, to take a greater number of Coolies than the proportion allowed by law, under the promise that they are to occupy the Cabins of the ship. If there could be any security that they would not be turned out to herd with the "green-deck Coolies, as soon as the Pilot had left the ship, the objection to this course would be mitigated; by any statement. It is connected with the exaltation of fraternal intercourse, when the disappointed and the successful, the faint and the confident meet together, and commune of their peculiar and their common interests and expectations. Benefit of this kind, beyond the hope of the most sanguine, has been realized even in the infancy of the Association; and much more may be anticipated, when attention ceases to be required for its mere organization, and the whole time devoted to its assemblies can be given to their proper objects. Hereafter the Association will be the means of concentrating for the Diast Mission, the most important information respecting the spiritual wants of the various districts of Bengal, the openings which may occur in them for the communication of the Gospel, and the resources which may be developed in the country. It will also lead to the proposal of endowments of general and extensive usefulness, for the execution of which every thing requisite will be found within the Association itself. A beginning of such things has been realized already. Besides that two very interesting calls for the assistance of Native Preachers have been happily met, the Association has obtained the promise of several of its members to prepare, under its sanction, books of Christian instruction for the Native Converts, both suited to the exigencies of the times, and calculated for constant use; and there will immediately appear, we believe, a Monthly Magazine, in English and Bengali, for the diffusion of interesting religious intelligence, and sound Christian doctrine, and the promotion of true piety amongst the Native Churches. The charge will be very moderate; but, even then, it can scarcely be expected that a subscription list should be obtained, sufficient for maintaining the Magazine, amongst the Native converts. The help of the Christian community generally will therefore be solicited; and while such solicitude, it is hoped, will find in the English side of the work a fair return for his subscription, he will have the satisfaction also of knowing, that he is contributing to place the means of spiritual edification and enjoyment within the reach of his less privileged brethren, the Native members of our Churches.

Fifty years ago, the Baptist Mission was formed by a mere handful of Christian men, and with resources which, except to the eye of faith, must have appeared ridiculous in connection with the objects to be pursued. The result has been anything but ridiculous. It satisfies even the imagination. Should the influence of the Association now formed, grow after a like fashion during the next fifty years, and be accompanied by a similar increase in vigor in other Evangelical denominations in what a position will Christianity stand in Bengal, when our next Jubilee is held!

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN INDIA.—The Act, of which the draft was given in the last number of the official Gazette, is unquestionably the most important which has been published by this Government, since the celebrated abolition of Slavery. In thirty short lines, slavery is extinguished throughout the whole empire of British India. The enactment has all the grace of a spontaneous concession. Other grievances have been the theme of incessant agitation at home, and the removal of them has been fought on the Government by the pressure from without. But though the subject of Indian Slavery has not failed to engage the attention of benevolent minds in England, and efforts have not been wanting to procure its abolition, yet, it has never occupied so prominent a place among public objects, nor has the abolition of slavery been demanded with such stern and incessant importunity, as to force it irresistibly on the attention of the Government of India. While the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies is to be traced distinctly to an unextinguishable burst of national indignation, the public anger on the subject of East India Slavery has alternately waxed and waned, and Government has been left to abolish it at its own leisure. The great Charter of emancipation has now been promulgated.

The injustice, not of Eight, but of Twenty-eight centuries is at length redressed. Since the period when the Hindoos first crossed the Indus, and reduced this country to subjection, and introduced the iniquitous law that a "state of servitude was natural to men of the servile class," and established fifteen different sorts of slaves, through every change of circumstance or government or dynasty, man has not ceased to hold his fellow man in a state of slavery. From the time when the Institutes of Manu were compiled, to the present time, the institution of slavery has never ceased to disturb the happiness of the community; and we may safely affirm that 1843 is the first year, since the twenty century before Christ, in which it could be said, the abolition of slavery, that "slaves cannot breathe in India."

It is gratifying to trace in this law the gradual progress of sound and benevolent principle in the administration of India. Under the Hindoo and Mahomedan dynasties, we are not surprised to find the existence of slavery authorized by law, and enforced by the Courts. But on this particular point our first rulers do not seem to have been at all in advance of their half-civilized predecessors. When for the first time we took the public administration into our own hands in 1773, not only was no effort made to mitigate the slavery which existed, but it was enacted by British statesmen that "the family of the criminals, who were convicted of highway robbery, should become the slaves of the state, and be disposed of for the general benefit and convenience of the people." It was also ordained that "every convicted murderer and felon, not condemned to death by the sentence of the Court, should be sold for a slave, or transported as such to the penal settlement on the Coast of Sumatra." Such were the principles introduced into the first code of laws promulgated by British authority in India. The great contrast, which the present Act presents, after the lapse of nearly two centuries to the Act of 1773, cannot fail to impart the highest gratification to every benevolent mind, not merely as it affords a mitigation of present misery, but as it holds out the prospect of still further improvement in the administration of this country.

The present Act does not, it is true, propose formally to abolish slavery in India, but it renders the existence of slavery impossible, by forbidding the Courts to give man a right in whatever property he may acquire by his own labour or by inheritance, and by attaching the same penalty to every act done against a man deemed a slave with which the act would be visited, if done against a free man. When every slave is permitted thus to appeal to the Courts for the establishment of his liberty, slavery becomes virtually extinct. It cannot exist except through the support of the Courts. A slave, who chooses to forego his appeal for freedom to the Courts, is legally a free man, though voluntarily a slave. The Act therefore, although cautiously penned, and prudently entitled, "An Act for declaring and amending the law regarding the condition of slavery," is in all intents and purposes a law for the abolition of slavery throughout the Company's territories.

The ease with which the state of slavery has been thus abolished, among a hundred millions of people, with a single stroke of the pen, could not to be overlooked. The instruction it affords us is most edifying. It gives us another proof, that the obstacles to improvement in India arise quite as much from the lethargy or prejudice of its governors, as from the nature of circumstances. Those difficulties vanish the moment they have summoned resolution enough to encounter them. Thus it was with Slavery; thus it was, with the convention of Government with the shrines of idolatry, and with many other questions involving the welfare of the country, which were annually postponed, nominally from regard to the obstacles said to lie in the way, but really for want of little virgins' pluck at the Council Chamber. And those other victories which yet remain to be achieved, to render our Government a blessing to India, will depend almost entirely upon the courage with which the members of the administration are enabled to overcome their own fears and prejudices.

The following is the Draft of the Act:—
As, let the draft, and now they have been secured by the enactment of Slavery within the Territories of the East India Company.

I. It is hereby enacted and declared, that no person (whether sold in execution of any decree or order of a court, or for the satisfaction of any judgment of Court or Revenue or otherwise) shall be sold any person or the right to the compulsory labour or service of any person on the ground that such person is in a state of slavery.

II. And it is hereby declared and enacted, that no right or claim of an alien of property in the person or service of another as a slave shall be enforced by any Civil or Criminal Court or Magistrate within the Territories of the East India Company.

III. And it is hereby declared and enacted, that no person who may have acquired property by his own industry or by the exercise of any art, calling or profession, or by inheritance, assignment, gift or bequest shall be deprived of such property or prevented from taking possession thereof on the ground that such person or that the person from whom the property may have been derived was a slave.

IV. And it is hereby enacted, that any Act which would be a penal offence if done to a free man, shall be equally so if done to any person on the pretext of his being in a condition of slavery.

THE HICKARY AND THE GATTA.—Mrs. HENRY Moore, in a preface to one of her works, dwells much on the difficulty of knowing when to stop. We have endeavoured to profit by her experience, and have thought it prudent to limit our own remarks upon any particular subject to three consecutive numbers. But we are now obliged to break through this rule, from courtesy to the Readers, and again to return to the Gates. Our "esteemed" contemporary, in its issue of last Friday says, it is our "most subject" that we have gone a little out of our mind, and that we are likely to gratify our readers with a weekly article on the inauspicious procession, still it has been arranged in embryo, or has died a natural death. A sage philosopher has somewhere remarked that to man condemn a vice in another, to which he has not a natural propensity himself. We have sometimes been disposed to evil at this point, and a feeling of self-love has even questioned the accuracy of it, but the instance now presented by our worthy contemporary goes far to show, that there is some solid foundation for it. The monomania, which he lays at our door, has been no where more conspicuous than in his own columns, since the insurrection at Cabul drove him a good deal out of his mind. Since that unhappy event, he has dwelt week after week on the iniquity of the Afghan invasion and the crimes of Lord Auckland, with a degree of pertinacity almost without example. With the exception of our still more esteemed contemporary, the Bombay Times, the Press of India has never furnished a clearer exhibition of this feeling. So constantly indeed has the subject been intruded on his readers as to lead to the suspicion, that the Editor had a distinct contributor on his establishment, who under an engagement to furnish a denunciation of the Afghan campaign, at the least once a week, and oftener if need be. Yet he now turns upon us for having in three articles dwelt upon the inauspicious procession of the old Gates!

We have been accustomed to account for these reiterated remarks in the Harbinger on Lord Auckland's delinquency, by a reference to the difficulty our contemporary has experienced in his attempt to demonstrate it. Had the transgression been so palpable, there would have been no occasion for a hundred essays to prove it. Though he may be satisfied, that in the circumstances in which Lord Auckland found himself placed, war in Afghanistan was not inevitable, he is aware that many men of equal discernment with himself, may and have come to a very different conclusion. The laboured attempts which he is constantly making to enlist them on his own side, while they have shewn the weakness of his cause, have also been calculated rather to defeat than to promote his object. The spirit moreover, in which the articles have been composed, has generally furnished a satisfactory antidote to the arguments they contained. Our contemporary appears quite sensible that the temper in which he writes, is likely to be considered vindictive, and he endeavours to remove this impression; but the perseverance with which he pursues our late Governor General, and the occasional virulence of his expressions, too clearly disclose the spring of his opposition. No man, whose sole object is to promote the "interests of humanity," would talk of hunting down his game.

In the case we have taken up, we have the suffrage of the whole Press of India on our side. None of our brethren have ventured to express a single doubt of the absurdity of the "procession" to the Gates to Sumnath. And we trust that our motives will bear the closest inspection. When this proceeding was first announced, we united our voice with that of the other public journals of India, in the hope that Lord Ellenborough might be induced to throw up the project. When we found that arrangements had actually been made for carrying it into effect, we returned to the subject in the hope of drawing public attention to it as home, in time to prevent its consummation. Nothing could have been more remote from our intention than to draw off popular opinion, as our contemporary expresses it, "from the true scent; a scent which if followed, the game must run down." It did not appear to us that the folly of the Gates might be used as a net off to the policy of the Afghan war; but since the Harbinger has suggested the idea, we have weighed it with much attention, and feel satisfied that his worst fears are likely to be realized. The "scent" will surely be drawn off the game. The enormity of the Afghan policy will be lost sight of in the more palpable absurdity of the Gates. Our recent triumph will throw our previous reverses into the shade, and produce a conviction that they are to be traced to a military origin, and might equally have occurred if our cause had been as just as it is represented to be unjust. The mind, relieved from the horrors of the insurrection by our victories on the same soil, will be at liberty to discuss the policy of the war with calm and unprejudiced feelings, and to judge how far it is to be justified by the only justification of war—the apparent necessity of the case. Lord Ellenborough's proceeding will, on the other hand, form the acutest object of public misadversion, and so entirely occupy the attention of men as to leave them no leisure for other delinquencies. The outcry against Lord Auckland has had its day, and passed the zenith of its strength. It can scarcely be revived. John Bull is a good liver, but he cannot hate two objects with equal intensity at the same time. Whenever he is roused, he concentrates his fury on a single object, and becomes comparatively indifferent to others. We may therefore take up the language of our contemporary, and with perfect safety reverse its arrangement and affirm—Ulam as we may about the unprovoked invasion of Afghanistan, and the wicked negligence by which our troops were left in the face of repeated warnings to be massacred, yet the impetuosity of this ridiculous procession of the old rotten gates will snarl out in all its native deafness, moving and gibbering before the public.

THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—At the Meeting of the Agricultural Society held on Wednesday the 11th instant, the long agitated question of the Secretaryship was at length decided, to the disappointment of nearly all the candidates for that office. It was resolved, that there should be no paid Secretary for the present. A Committee had previously been appointed to examine the state of the funds, when it was discovered that the sum in hand at the close of the year was only Seven hundred Rupees; and that the current expenditure was barely covered by the income. The recent order of Government, on the subject of postage, will throw an additional expense of more than a thousand Rupees a year upon a fund which has been reduced within the last month to the same annual extent by the withdrawal of more than thirty members. Under these circumstances, it became the duty of prudence, to avoid incurring an additional outlay of nearly five thousand Rupees a year, which to all appearance would have involved the Society in embarrassments that might have affected its stability.

The question regarding the proxies of members residing at a distance from Calcutta, which has shaken the Society to its foundation, was ordered to be taken up into consideration at the next Meeting. It is greatly to be regretted, that the question was ever mooted at all. The Society has grown to its present state of prosperity under an arrangement which left the management of its concerns in the hands of resident members; and it is to be feared, that the necessity of taking the votes of members scattered over a thousand miles of land, on every question of importance, will very materially impede its operations. But as the subject has been agitated, and made a party question, the right must apparently be conceded; or the Society will lose the support of those whose co-operation is essential to its success.

These squabbles regarding the Secretaryship have seriously injured the Society. They have drawn off the attention of its members from the public objects for which the Association was formed, and introduced a spirit of contention which it will not be easy to allay. It is to be hoped, however, that all who are interested in its progress, will bury in oblivion the feelings which this contest has excited, and give their hearty and undivided attention to the real business of the Society; and thus restore it to public confidence. We hope the numbers who have seceded will be induced to return; and that those who are wavering about their withdrawal will exhibit the magnanimity of their character, by continuing to co-operate with a body which, with all its imperfections—and they are inseparable from every institution—has done great good to the country, and possesses the means of doing still more good.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12.

—The great question of the Secretaryship of the Agricultural Society, on which the community within the Ditch has been in a state of agitation for three months, was decided yesterday. There was an assemblage of not fewer than One Hundred and Twenty members, the largest on the records of the Society, larger even than the gathering to discuss the bell changes and snail-races of the season at the annual dinner. Like the Army of Reserve the meeting ended in nothing. It was determined that there should be no paid Secretary at all; but that the Assistant Secretary should do all the work and an Honorary Secretary have the credit of it.

—The New Tariff—or New Custom Duties, as the Aduitment officers are now ready for delay, at the Star Press, in which the Fraser says, he has added the Old Duties, and also the Corn Duties—as though the New Duties were not quite enough of themselves!

—Col. Palmer's trial for the surrender of Ghazni commenced at Ferozepore on the 27th of December. There can scarcely be the shadow of a doubt that it will end in his honorable acquittal. The fortitude with which the noble little band of the 27th Native Infantry held that fortress against the most fearful odds through the sharpest privations, for more than three months, will be fully established by this Court Martial, and it is to be hoped that the acquittal of Palmer and his brave companions will be followed by the bestowal of the honors they so richly earned.

—The orders for the Court Martial of Col. Shelton were issued at Ferozepore on the 30th of last month. The Court will meet on the 20th of the present month at Lucknow, and will be composed of Major General Dick, as President and thirteen Major Generals, together with Brigadiers Roberts and Paul, and Lieut. Col. Rich.

—The report that Captain Anderson, Boyd, Eyre and others, who went over to Akber Khan by the orders of their own commanding officer, had been released from arrest is premature. They remain under arrest till their trial is over.

—The Prince Royal of the Punjab, Pertab Singh, the eldest son of Rajah Shere Singh, arrived in the Governor General's Camp on the 30th of last month, accompanied by Rajah Dhyan Singh, General Court, and a very splendid escort of infantry, cavalry and six guns, on a visit to the Governor General. The young prince is about ten years old. On the 1st of January there was an official meeting between the Sirdar Deputation and Lord Ellenborough, after which the whole party proceeded to the field and viewed the remains of the battle of Salasamp, by the whole

In a long document,* their Excellencies Katsue and Naw-xan publish the following, as the settled results of their negotiations with the British Plenipotentiary while at Nanking.

1. The Chinese Government will at present be responsible for the Hong merchants paying to their English creditors, debt to the amount of two millions of dollars.—Hereafter Hong merchants and all other classes of natives, are to be alone responsible for their own debts; the Mandarins only affixing their official aid.

2. None but merchant ships are to come and go to the Five Ports, no ships of war being allowed to visit them. Not even merchant ships are to visit any other than the Five Ports.

3. The English fully agree to the rebuilding of all the Fortresses, and the putting of them in the same state of defence as formerly.

4. Although peace is declared, all places in the Empire may not be fully aware of it, and should the officers in those undisturbed places cause a trouble to the English; no fighting is to take place, as all will soon be fully informed by Proclamation of the establishment of amity and good will.

5. As soon as this year's instalment of the money is paid, the English ships of war are to withdraw from the Long River and return to their own country.

6. The English Plenipotentiary agrees to place under immediate arrest, every British officer who may be found levying duties upon Chinese shipping.

7. In all difficulties between the natives of China and the natives of England, which may arise from their intercourse at the Five Ports, the Chinese are to be handed over to the Chinese Authorities of the place, and the English to the English Authorities for trial, etc. &c.

8. The English agree, that if any Chinese criminals take refuge on board an English Merchant ship or man of war, or take up their residence at Hongkong, to give them up, upon requisition from the Chinese authorities. China enters into a like agreement towards English criminals.—The Friend of China, November 24th.

PROCLAMATION.

Sir Henry Pottinger, bart. her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary in China, has, on his arrival at Amoy, learned with extreme horror and astonishment, that many more than a hundred subjects of her Britannic Majesty, who were wrecked on the ships Nerbudda and Ann, in the months of September 1841, and March 1842, on the coast of the Island of Formosa, have been recently put to death by the Chinese authorities on that Island, who allege, that they perpetrated this bloodied act in obedience to the imperial commands.

Had the unhappy people who have suffered on the occasion even been prisoners of war, taken while fighting with arms in their hands, their massacre (which is aggravated by a lapse of time of nearly a year) would have been a most flagrant violation of the acknowledged and well-understood rules and feelings which distinguish warfare amongst civilized nations, and contrasts it with the sanguinary and inhuman practices and ideas of mere savages; but, when her Majesty's plenipotentiary calls to mind that the unfortunate individuals, on whom this foul deed has been committed, were ineffective camp-followers and coolies, who neither were armed, nor had any means of defending themselves or of molesting others, and were especially entitled, as distressed and shipwrecked men, both by the laws and usages of China, to kindness and protection, the plenipotentiary has no language by which he can sufficiently proclaim the sentiments of abhorrence and detestation with which he views this inhumanable act, the recollection of which will remain as a stain and disgrace in the annals of the Chinese Empire.

Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary has already obtained positive official proof, that the commands issued by the emperor for putting to death her Britannic Majesty's subjects were derived from his imperial majesty by the gross and merciless misrepresentations of the local authorities on Formosa, who, with the object of personal aggrandizement, basely and falsely reported to the emperor at Peking, that both the ship Nerbudda, and subsequently the brig Ann, had gone to that Island with hostile intentions, an assertion not more lying and false, than manifestly absurd, since neither of those vessels were ships of war, or had, when wrecked, any troops or other fighting men on board of them.

Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary now intends to respectfully, though firmly, submit the real facts of this dreadful affair to the special notice of the emperor, through the imperial commissioners and ministers, and to demand, in the name of his sovereign, the Queen of Great Britain, that the local authorities on the Island of Formosa, whose false and pitiless misrepresentations have led to the horrid event which has called for this proclamation, shall be degraded and (consequently) punished; and, further, that their property shall be confiscated, and its amount paid over to the officers of the British Government, to be applied to the relief and support of the families of the innocent men who have been put to death on false and cruel accusation. Without this just atonement,

Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary is not prepared to say, that the event which has occurred, and which it becomes the plenipotentiary's travelling duty to report to her Majesty's Government, will not be the cause of a further serious misunderstanding, or, that it may not even lead to a renewal of hostilities between the two empires, which would be greatly to be deplored, as involving this country and its people in fresh misery and evil, for the crimes of a few shameless and unworthy miscreants in power, who have, from base motives, imposed on their own sovereign, and have thus brought her Majesty's Government, by her Majesty's will, in his wisdom, see the justice as well as policy of making the retribution which is herein pointed out, which is due both to England and China, and will avert further calamity.

That all persons may know the real state of the case, this proclamation is published in the English and Chinese languages for general information.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

PROCLAMATION.

To the Chinese.

Sir Henry Pottinger, bart., her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary in China, announced, in his proclamation under date the 23rd instant, that a number of her Britannic Majesty's subjects had been cruelly and cowardly put to death by the local officers on the island of Formosa.

The plenipotentiary has now further to announce the following clear details which he has obtained from a few of the shipwrecked men, who have been sent over to Amoy, to be released agreeably to the treaty.

On board the ship "Nerbudda," which was wrecked in September 1841, there were altogether 274 souls; of these, 20 were Europeans, 2 Mandarins, and 244 Natives of India.

All the Europeans, accompanied by 3 Mandarins and 3 Natives of India, left the ship in the boats as soon as she struck on the rocks, and thus, exactly 240 Natives of India were left behind. These men remained by the ship, which had drifted over the reef, and was lying in smooth water in Kihang bay, for five days, and then landed on reefs, without arms or weapons of any description. In landing, some men were drowned in the surf, others were killed by plunderers who came down to strip them as they reached the shore, and the rest were seized and imprisoned in separate small parties, where they were left in heavy iron, with hardly any clothing, and very small allowance of food, from which privations many died after great suffering. Of the whole 240 who left the ship on the raft, only 2 men have been sent over to Amoy.

On board the brig "Ann," which was wrecked on the passage from Chusan to Macao in the month of March, there were altogether 57 souls. Of these, 14 were Natives of Europe or America, 8 Chinese, 4 Portuguese or Malays, and 34 Natives of India. The brig was driven by the violence of the wind and sea so high on shore, that when the tide ebbed the sea was left dry, and the fifty-seven men quitted her and put on board a China junk, with the hope of being enabled to put to sea in her; but this could not be effected, and they succumbed, without having fired even one musket, or made the smallest resistance to the Chinese troops that had come down to the spot.

Like the unfortunate men of the "Nerbudda," those who were in the "Ann" were stripped stark naked, and dragged in that state to the capital of Formosa, where they were separated and confined in small parties, which had little communication with each other, but were all treated with extreme barbarity and almost starved.

Out of the 57 souls who were cast away in the "Ann," 8 have just arrived at Amoy. Of these, 6 are Natives of Europe or America, one a Native of India, and one Chinese. A second Chinaman is alive, and is said to have staid at Formosa of his own choice.

It thus appears from the preceding details, that two hundred and thirty-seven persons belonging to the "Nerbudda," and forty-six belonging to the "Ann," have either been put to death by the officers of the Chinese government on Formosa, or have perished through ill treatment and starvation.

These atrocious and appalling facts are not to be refused or questioned, and, that all may judge of them, and compare the conduct of the Chinese of the British Government (who set all their prisoners free), this proclamation is made in Chinese. Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary trusts, however, that the emperor will yet make the only atonement that remains, and thereby avert further evils.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

Dated on board the steam frigate "Queens," at Amoy, on the 27th day of November, 1842, corresponding with the Chinese date the 29th day of the 10th month in the 22nd year of Taoukwang.

THE SYNOD OF ABERDEEN.—On Tuesday and Wednesday last two Nations were made in the Synod—the one not to admit to their places those members of Synod who were separated by the sentences of the last General Assembly; the other relating to the independence of the Church, as affected by the decision of the House of Lords in the Avenstader case. Both Nations were put. The suspended ministers were admitted by a majority of eighty-one to seventy-one; the majority in the other case was seventy-four to sixty-four. The Bazaar of Aberdeen calls the Synod "the insubordinate Synod," and impugns the movement of the moderates to a wish "to dismember the north-eastern district from the Established Church." Now that one Synod has separated from the General Assembly, there will be two Established Churches in Scotland—the Synod of Aberdeen, and the Synods which still adhere to the Assembly.—Record.

CHRISTIAN UNION.—Our attention has been drawn to a "Proposal for a new Christian Union," which was put forth, some months ago, in the Congregational Magazine, and which, it is understood, will be brought before the Assembly of the CHINA.—The Queen Steamer has arrived from China with intelligence to the 23d of December, of a still more important character than that which reached Calcutta last week. On the 7th of December, a collision took place between some lascars of the Fort Williams and some Chinese, at Canton and a Chinaman was stabbed. The lascars were defeated; the mob, flushed with success, increased to ten thousand men, and meeting with no check from the Chinese authorities, proceeded to attack the English factories, which they burnt and plundered. Two ladies, who were in the factories, were providentially conveyed to the house of one of the Hong Merchants and saved from the fury of the rioters. Sir Hugh Gough, who happened to be at Canton at the time, stationed a Steamer there for the protection of British interests, and ordered a large force to be in readiness to proceed to that city. The merchants addressed a letter to the Plenipotentiary on the subject of the disturbance, in which they censured the supineness of the local authorities of the city, and requested that the force at his disposal might be directed to afford them security in their mercantile transactions. Sir Henry Pottinger in his reply, traced the disturbance to their own imprudence, asserting that they had received every assistance from the British authorities, but, so far from affording him any support in the difficult negotiations on hand, had thrown obstacles in his way. He also distinctly refused to march troops to their assistance, and, at the earnest entreaty of the Chinese Mandarins, withdrew the Steamer. The merchants in their rejoinder endeavoured to rebut the disparaging assertions made by the Plenipotentiary, and denied the accuracy of his statements. There the matter rests for the present. Up to the 23d of December, a fortnight after the riot, no further attempts had been made by the mob; and the troops which had been employed on the expedition,—with the exception of those left at Hong-Kong, Amoy and Chusan,—had been allowed to take their departure for India. By this measure, Sir Henry Pottinger has given the most decisive evidence of his conviction, that the outbreak was the result of local irritation, and originated in no desire on the part of the Chinese Government to disturb the pacification. The discussion between the merchants and Sir Henry has unfortunately given birth to party spirit, which will greatly increase the difficulty of discovering the real merits of the question.

It was well known for some time before the riot broke out, that the strongest feelings of animosity towards the English existed in the breasts of a very influential body of Chinese in and about Canton. The destruction of all the defenses in the river, the attack on the city, and its consequent ransom in 1841, so humiliating to national pride, combined with the eventual triumph of our arms, and the acknowledgment of the Emperor, that he had been obliged to yield to circumstances, had inflamed the minds of the people almost to madness. The spirit, though the inflammatory proclamation had been printed and dispersed in and about Canton by the malcontents, and their attempts to organize troops and to raise contributions, showed too clearly that there was a storm brewing, which must place the persons and property of Englishmen in that city in extreme jeopardy. In that manifesto, we find such cause to have arisen. A season of extraordinary peril called for extraordinary caution; and yet the most obvious maxims of prudence appear to have been neglected. While the natives of this vast empire were as yet unconquered to the humiliating position in which our victories had placed it, and were petitioning the Emperor to break the peace and expel us; while they were manifesting the strongest desire to set the public authorities at defiance, and to take the duty of national vengeance into their own hands, it certainly behoved the merchants to act with the utmost wariness, and to avoid every appearance which might inflame the spirit of hostility; and so far as they have neglected any opportunity of soothing the people, and adopted a line of policy in their intercourse with them, which were an aid of triumph, so far they have made themselves responsible for the misfortunes which have befallen them. The determination of the Plenipotentiary will be approved, not less on account of its intrinsic wisdom, than of his official position. In the decisive measure he pursued on hearing of the wanton massacre of the crews of the Nerbudda and the Anna, he has afforded a pledge of his determination not to allow the Chinese Government or any of its officers to trample on his countrymen. His refusal to send up a force to Canton, that the merchants might be able to carry on their mercantile transactions in security under the shadow of its protection, is not less judicious, and will secure him the praise of all disinterested men. After the Emperor had acceded to the terms of peace, Sir H. Pottinger could not have taken any such step, without incurring the charge of political inconsistency, more especially as the Chinese authorities in the city had disavowed all participation in the riot, and expressed their determination to punish the rioters. The appearance of a British force would have irritated the minds of the people at a most critical juncture to incurable resentment, and probably occasioned a second and more extensive insurrection, by which our half-finished pacific relations with the Empire might have been broken asunder; and a renewal of hostilities rendered inevitable. It would have called forth the loudest remonstrances from the discontented provinces of the Empire, strengthened the hands of the war party in the cabinet, and laid a fresh train of calamities; we rejoice therefore that he has had the wisdom and firmness to resist the demand, though at the risk of losing some portion of his popularity.

The Chinese Authorities appear to have been fully aware of the irritation which pervaded the public mind, for we find that the day before the flame broke forth, the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Province fixed up a proclamation, in which the rioters were denounced, and the peaceably disposed, cautioned against these seditious insinuations. The existence of this feeling was equally known to the English merchants, who proceeded to Canton to make it the seat of their commercial operations. But they do not appear to have taken the smallest precautions against the danger which menaced them. Instead of adopting any measures to allay the irritation by a quiet and unobtrusive course of procedure, a hundred and seventy lascars were allowed to go up to Canton without any controlling authority among them; the laws were openly set at naught, and the prejudices of the Chinese violated by the presence of ladies in the factories, though the inflammatory proclamation had stated, as one of the chief grievances of the new order of things, the prospect that the Chinese and foreigners were to dwell together. Though the dispute with the lascars was only the immediate cause of the riot, yet it was certainly in the highest degree imprudent to have allowed any such cause to have arisen. A season of extraordinary peril called for extraordinary caution; and yet the most obvious maxims of prudence appear to have been neglected. While the natives of this vast empire were as yet unconquered to the humiliating position in which our victories had placed it, and were petitioning the Emperor to break the peace and expel us; while they were manifesting the strongest desire to set the public authorities at defiance, and to take the duty of national vengeance into their own hands, it certainly behoved the merchants to act with the utmost wariness, and to avoid every appearance which might inflame the spirit of hostility; and so far as they have neglected any opportunity of soothing the people, and adopted a line of policy in their intercourse with them, which were an aid of triumph, so far they have made themselves responsible for the misfortunes which have befallen them.

The determination of the Plenipotentiary will be approved, not less on account of its intrinsic wisdom, than of his official position. In the decisive measure he pursued on hearing of the wanton massacre of the crews of the Nerbudda and the Anna, he has afforded a pledge of his determination not to allow the Chinese Government or any of its officers to trample on his countrymen. His refusal to send up a force to Canton, that the merchants might be able to carry on their mercantile transactions in security under the shadow of its protection, is not less judicious, and will secure him the praise of all disinterested men. After the Emperor had acceded to the terms of peace, Sir H. Pottinger could not have taken any such step, without incurring the charge of political inconsistency, more especially as the Chinese authorities in the city had disavowed all participation in the riot, and expressed their determination to punish the rioters. The appearance of a British force would have irritated the minds of the people at a most critical juncture to incurable resentment, and probably occasioned a second and more extensive insurrection, by which our half-finished pacific relations with the Empire might have been broken asunder; and a renewal of hostilities rendered inevitable. It would have called forth the loudest remonstrances from the discontented provinces of the Empire, strengthened the hands of the war party in the cabinet, and laid a fresh train of calamities; we rejoice therefore that he has had the wisdom and firmness to resist the demand, though at the risk of losing some portion of his popularity.

THE DUCKENHILL MAIL came in on Tuesday morning the 26th, bringing intelligence from England to the 6th of that month. The intelligence received by this opportunity is emphatically unimportant. Scarcely a single event is announced in connection with any part of the European or American world, which is worthy of record. The general aspect of affairs in our own beloved country was however, more pleasing than at the departure of the previous mail. The glorious intelligence of the pacification of Asia, the successes in Afghanistan and China, reached London by express on the 21st November, and produced a very powerful effect on the public edification, at the next meeting. The most cordial demonstrations of joy, on the part of Parliament, were exhibited throughout the country; and as it was proposed to raise to further the objects of far, as at this distance of place and time, we are this association, is likely to be doubled. Notwithstanding the revived firmness of our commercial and manufacturing prospects, there seems to be an increasing conviction that the corn law is the cancer worm at the root of our prosperity; and it is probable that the next Session will give, if not a fixed duty, at least a further relaxation of the monopoly. On the whole, the prospects of the country are evidently improving, and Sir Robert Peel will doubtless be able to meet Parliament again with a more cheerful confidence than he could have anticipated at the close of the last Session. His own party will also be found perhaps to have gained some wisdom during the recess, and will be disposed to make such further concessions as may serve to bind all classes in one common and united effort to meet the difficulties of the times.

MAJOR POTTINGER.—The Harbuz remarks about a fortnight since, on the authority of letters from Ferozpoor, that Major Pottinger the Chinese; while the opening of five ports to our manufactures has served to impart new life to our drooping commerce. The advice from all parts of England, which are furnished by the present mail, are more cheerful than any previous announcement during the year. Amidst these general remarks on the effect produced by the auspicious cargo of news sent from Bombay on the 16th of October, we must not forget the particular interest connected with the movement in Dublin. The Corporation of that city having voted its freedom to Sir Robert Sale, on which he is to be tried, and the mode in which the charges themselves are worded, giving such support to the information received by the Mr. Fitzpatrick, a genuine representative of his own warm hearted country, proposed to confer it also on Lady Sale; and if they cannot find a precedent for such honors, they will create one; and a more suitable occasion for creating a good precedent they could scarcely have found.

The Treaty for the Suppression of the Slave-trade, in which is included the mutual right of search, has been finally signed by the four Powers. The date of this Act of humanity is the 15th November. The fifth power refused to become a party to it. France contributes her empty good-will to the cause of benevolence, but refuses any active co-operation. Her jealousy of England would prevent her accession to any measure in which England was interested; and this national feeling of hostility, so sedulously nourished by the Parisian journalists, so though it were a part of their stock in trade, appears to have received indefinite strength from the contents of the Mail, which traversed France on the 20th of November, on its way to London. While France, with the recollections of the Empire yet fresh, is impatient to expand her influence, and can find no field for her ambition, but in Africa, where the laurels of her heroes grow upon their tombs, she finds England casting off a connection in which she had experienced mortification, but not before Central Asia had rung with the report of her victories. She finds her extending her influence over the vast empire of China, humbling the proud dynasty of the Tartars to the dust, and opening new fields for her commerce, and erecting a new pivot for her power, in a region which had hitherto been sealed against the European family.

The anti-corn law league appears to be gathering strength for another struggle with the land-those who will consider the question invidious, is likely far to exceed that of those, who will attribute it to a generous motive.

The enquiry regarding the drafts drawn on the Supreme Government, in the hour of extremity, by Major Pottinger, wears a still more questionable aspect. It is rarely that a British functionary is placed in circumstances of such extreme difficulty, as those in which he found himself. He was only Assistant in the Political department, on the spot, at a time when the Head of the Establishment was infamously assassinated, after he had commenced a negotiation, which even the pressing danger of the troops would barely justify. He took charge of the office, and with it of the negotiations, simply because there was no one else on whom it could devolve. The whole of his previous career, by which he has earned so brilliant a reputation throughout Europe, forces on us the belief that nothing less than the unexampled emergency of the case, and the hope of saving the lives of eight or ten thousand men, would have induced him to affix his signature to the Bills thus extorted from him. He might possibly have avoided the trial he has now undergone, by refusing to act at all; but then he would not have been the Eldred Pottinger, whom no personal risk among friends or foes could deter from the performance of the duty he owed to his country. Whether he would, by refusing to act, have rendered himself liable to severe official censures or not, it is certain he would have been considerably unpardonable as a man, if, in his position and with his qualifications, he had refused all assistance to the beleaguered army. It is for Government itself, not for any inferior agent, to determine whether it will recognize any of his acts, and honour any of the bills which he drew. It is altogether without precedent, for the Supreme Authority in the state to submit to its own officers the delicate question, how far it is bound to the payment of certain sums of money drawn by a Political Agent in any given circumstances.

The circumstances, under which these Bills for fourteen lakhs of Rupees were drawn, were analogous to those under which Captain Elliott acted in reference to the surrendered Opium, with this difference, that the difficulties in Cabul were infinitely greater than those at Canton. In neither case could the functionaries have been in possession of direct authority to draw bills on such an account on their superiors; in both cases they were constrained to act upon their own discretion, under the necessity of circumstances for which no provision could have been previously made. Yet in the matter of the Opium drafts, the home Government, without submitting the question to any Court of Enquiry, at once took upon itself the responsibility of refusing to recognize their validity; and it would perhaps have been more dignified, if the local Government had at once acted upon the precedent thus afforded, and determined to follow its own judgment in honouring or rejecting the Bills. Besides, the consideration for which they were granted, was not fulfilled. The troops were to be conducted in safety out of the country; they were basely murdered on their march. If the Chiefs, who received the money, knew that they had not the power to grant this safe conduct, and could not prevent the massacre of the army, they extorted the drafts on false pretences, and are not entitled to the payment of them. If

The wording of the charge is unfortunate, in as much as it affords the enemies of the Governor-General an opportunity of asserting, that it is evidently intended to mark his Lordship's personal feelings towards one, who rose to distinction during the reign of his predecessor. That the honour of the British name was deeply tarnished by the transactions of Cabul, and that a whole army was annihilated, is matter of history. What can be the object then of appointing a Court of Enquiry to examine whether the conduct of Major Pottinger, after the death of Sir W. Macnaghten, was such as to reflect honour on the British arms, except it be to associate our disgrace with his honoured name? Perhaps it may have been in the hope of his being able to establish the fact, that the counsels which led to our disasters were the very reverse of those which he offered. We fear, however, that the number of those who will consider the question invidious, is likely far to exceed that of those, who will attribute it to a generous motive. they possessed this power, and refused to exercise it, their claim is if possible still less valid.

THE SAILOR'S HOME.—The annual meeting of the Sailor's Home was held on Monday last, at the Town Hall. The Chair was taken by the President, Sir John Peter Grant. There were not above twenty gentlemen present; a very miserable attendance, considering the benevolent object and extensive usefulness of the Institution.

It would be altogether superfluous to say a word on the value of such an establishment in a port like Calcutta. The scenes of riot and debauchery, which are presented to the eye in the locality of the Punch Houses in the Lal Bazar throughout the day and far into the night, must convince every benevolent mind of the importance of maintaining an Institution, in which the sailors are rescued from the contagion of vice, and enabled to enjoy the comforts of a peaceful home during their brief residence on shore. It is therefore with feelings of great satisfaction we find, from the Report read at the Meeting, that the progress of the Home during the past year has been more encouraging than at any former period, and that arrangements have been completed for enlarging its accommodations. The number of men admitted into it during the past twelve months was 1250, being 487 in excess of the highest number received in any previous year; of those 1,197 have been shipped.

The Home has been removed from the obscure and inconvenient locality of Embassy lane to the large, airy and commodious house near the Police office. The expense of the new House is 400 Rupees a month, for which additional charge the Committee must look to public generosity, since the allowance made by Government for rent has been discontinued, and cannot be renewed without the sanction of the Court of Directors. We hope the Court will vote it back to the Committee without a dissentient voice. It seems odd at first sight that lakhs upon lakhs of Rupees can be lavished on a raree show at Ferozpoor without consulting the Court of Directors, while their consent is required to continue a small public grant, which contributes to rescue a thousand European sailors annually from the lowest depth of degradation. But this Government is a Government of anomalies. We hope the Committee will not fail to send a copy of their report to Leadenhall Street, and bring to the especial notice of the Court the fact, that the total saving to the poor sailor, which the existence of the Home has secured, amounts to 64,906 Rupees, which money would otherwise have been spent in the brothel and liquor shops of the town, and contributed to swell the mass of immorality, disease and death. The little monthly pittance for which the Committee are now suitors to our Honourable Masters, is after all but a small contribution from a great Government to the cause of public morals.

The proposal made by the Calcutta Temperance Society to co-operate with the Sailor's Home, on the condition that ardent spirits should be entirely excluded from it, has not been accepted; but we are happy to find that it was treated with the consideration which the benevolence of the motive demanded. It is to be reconsidered at the next meeting in July. We submit to this article, the reasons given by the Committee for not having accepted the alliance, and they appear to us satisfactory. We are fully aware that in offering such an opinion we are running counter to the views, the pure and generous views, of some friends whom we hold in the highest esteem, and with whom we are happy at all times to co-operate in every benevolent undertaking. But they will appreciate our motives, as we do theirs. Temperance Societies are excellent Institutions, and cannot be too wisely established. The Sailor's Home is equally an admirable Institution, established to correct a great and specific evil; and the more assistance it can obtain, the greater will be its means of doing good. But we much fear that the entire exclusion of spirituous liquors would induce many to quit it, and resort to the Punch Houses, and that the public interests it protects would be more injured by this diminution of its practical utility, than they would be promoted by an accession of influence and funds. The great object of the Sailor's Home is to keep the poor sailors from the wretched crimps who lie in wait to inveigle and strip them; and to induce habits of sobriety and temperance. It is not its object to eradicate the habit of drinking spirits, for which indeed the limited residence of the men at this retreat affords but little opportunity; and if, in any attempt to enforce total abstinence from liquor, the men were induced by the strength of their inclinations to leave the establishment, the cause of abstinence would gain nothing, and the cause of temperance and virtue would lose much. Besides, the quantity of ardent spirits drunk throughout the year is so small,—not averaging more than a wine glass a day for each,—as not to affect the value or utility of the institution. We think the two Associations must therefore be content to labor each in its own sphere, and upon its own principles, without any farther co-operation than mutual good-will.

A proposition has been made by the Calcutta Temperance Society, offering their co-operation on condition that spirituous liquors be entirely excluded from the institution; your Committee would have gladly acceded to this proposition, were they not of opinion that its adoption would cause a number of men to forsake the Home, and throw themselves into the hands of the crimps, and that many of those who would come, having been daily accustomed on board ships to their glass of grog, would not be satisfied without some allowance on shore; and that, therefore, if they were deprived from it entirely in the Home, many of them would resort to the Punch Houses, or to some of the lanes in the bazar, for the deleterious mixture usually vended there as spirits. The probability is, that having once entered those dens of iniquity, they would not quit them except in a state of intoxication; if, indeed, they were fortunate enough to escape from the clutches of the crimps.

Your Committee are further of opinion, that the day or the sum is much too short, averaging 12 to 15 days, to admit of persons of their habits deriving any permanent benefit from being obliged to abstain during their stay to temperance rules.

THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—A special meeting was held of the Agricultural Society on Wednesday last, the 8th instant, for the purpose of reconsidering the question of Proxies, and the late increase of subscription. Before entering on the discussion of these topics, the President read a requisition from Mr. Fiddington and fifty-four of his friends, and from seven other individuals to postpone the meeting, so as to allow of sufficient time for consulting the most distant stations on the questions to be submitted to the meeting. Sir John Grant replied, that he had no power, as President, to rescind the votes of a General Meeting. Mr. Tuxton then brought forward the following motion which was seconded by Mr. Kaye and carried, an amendment having been put by Mr. Fiddington and negatived:

"That on the question of all paid officers of this Society, and of the salaries to be given to any one officer of the Society; absent members shall be allowed to vote, by letter, addressed post paid to the Secretary, stating the person for whom they intend to vote and that on all questions carried at a meeting in Calcutta, the question shall be again submitted to the Society, on a requisition of 10 members in writing, addressed to the Secretary, to rescind the same, at which every absent member shall be entitled to vote by letter, such vote being addressed post paid to the Secretary."

We think this resolution is calculated in a great measure to meet the case. The Mofussil members will now possess the right of voting on the election of all the paid officers of the Society, and thus enjoy that influence which it is deemed so desirable they should possess. We have some doubts however about the working of the second proposition, that on the request of any ten members every question carried at a meeting may be re-opened at a subsequent meeting, when every absent member will be entitled to vote. We fear that an opportunity will thus be created for some factious or fractious members indefinitely to impede the business of the Society. It is on this ground alone that we have any objection to the votes of those who reside in the country. The advantage to be derived from their wisdom and experience will scarcely be equivalent to the disadvantage which may arise from the power now given to unsettle every thing.

The questions which are thus exposed to the risk of being rescinded, are not clearly defined; and it is not stated whether the arrangement is to be prospective only, or retrospective likewise; that is, whether all questions which have been already settled by the votes of the resident members may not thus be brought under reconsideration. Neither is there any definition of the period after which any measure which has been adopted, shall be considered to have been established. Under the wording of the resolution, any vote may at any future time be brought again before the Society; and much of its valuable time may thus be frittered away, in reconsidering the resolutions passed during the year. It is not clear moreover whether the ten members, whose requisition shall be sufficient to re-open any question, are to be resident or non-resident members. If any ten members in any district are at any time at liberty to demand the review after any lapse of time, of any measure which may be hereafter adopted, and the votes of five hundred of the members of the Society scattered over the country are to be taken upon it, the energies of the Society will be wasted in contention, and its capacity of benefitting the country materially curtailed. And there is no provision for the period at which the scrutiny shall be taken upon any point thus submitted to the universal suffrage of the whole body; and it may, for aught we see to the contrary, be kept open six months awaiting the arrival of proxies. We could have wished that the resolution had been more precisely worded, and that a little scope had been left as possible for those innumerable discussions, which may be expected to arise from the spirit of contention which has unfortunately obtained a footing in the Society.

THE FEROZPOOR TOURNAMENT HAS CLOSED; and the troops are now on their way to their respective Cantonments. and the troops are now on their way to their respective Cantonments. The Governor General has put forth two notifications in reference to this great event, in one of which the public is informed that the objects for which the Army of Reserve had been assembled, having been accomplished, the army was broken up; in the other we are told that after twenty-eight battalions of Infantry, eleven Regiments of Cavalry and seventeen batteries of artillery, comprising one hundred and two guns, had been reviewed by the Commander in Chief and had passed in column before the Governor General, thirty thousand men, that is, about thirty tons, of their favourite maddags, or sweetmeats, were distributed to the Native Regiments. From which it is natural to infer that the main object of keeping together an army of Reserve at an expense of 60, or 70,000*l.* a month, was to afford the Commander in Chief an opportunity of reviewing, and Lord Ellenborough the occasion of inspecting the man, and to feast them with sweetmeats. The sweetmeats were doubtless very acceptable, and were swallowed with much delight; only the announcement of such an event, in a public proclamation by order of the Governor General of British India, is naturally considered inconsistent with the dignity of the viceregal character. The minuteness with which the number of maddags is chronicled in this state document, affords an amusing contrast to the studied mystery, in which even the unimportant movements of Government are shrouded; and the subject will afford abundant food for ridicule to the Opposition Journals at home, and possibly call down fresh censures from the Authorities.

We have placed the notification on record in our columns, though without the remotest idea of its design. It may have been intended to subvert some great national object, which it is not the privilege of the present generation to understand; and it must therefore be made over to the researches, or the ingenuity of some future historian. It will remain for him to discover what political plan it was proposed to promote by announcing, that General Napier had concentrated at Sukkur fourteen Regiments of foot and horse, and an ample force of artillery,—that two vessels, lately transferred from the Euphrates, had been incorporated with the steam flotilla of the India,—that 14,000 troops had been assembled to preserve the tranquillity of one of our own provinces, where for three months, they had been searching for insurgents, without success, and that six Regiments lately employed in China were now at the disposal of the Governor General. This ambiguous enumeration of troops, at a time when peace has been "restored to Asia on the East and the West," may be attributed by some to the want of any adequate conception of the true nature and object of Government, or it may be intended to ensure the good behaviour of the Sikhs, the Nepales and the Amers of Scinde, when translated into their respective languages.—One thing at least is certain, that if the object of Lord Ellenborough is to veil all his proceedings in mystery, he has succeeded in doing so beyond any of his predecessors; for the details which he communicates, even to the minute enumeration of the sweetmeats, are as mysterious, as the secrets of state, which his Secretaries are obliged to keep as under the seal of confusion.

UNION BANK.—The arrival of the December Mail from England induces us to postpone to the next week, our own observations on the Meeting of the Union Bank, and the speeches delivered at it, partly because we are obliged to make room for the contents of the Mail, and partly because the public attention is engaged by matters of deeper interest. Suffice it for us that a Dividend of Eight per cent. was declared; that it was proposed to divide the loss arising from the transactions of the Bank with two of the late firms, over several years; and that it was distinctly announced that the Bank would lose nothing by the failure of Ferguson, Brewster and Co.; indeed, that a considerable sum would remain on hand after the claims of the Bank had been satisfied.

The same reason constrains us to postpone our remarks on the very interesting examination of the youths in the General Assembly's Institution, of which we publish the Programme.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19.

—A Meeting of the Indigo Planter's Association took place last Saturday, the attendance at which only served to mark the indifference of this body to the Society. This institution founded for their benefit can scarcely be kept in existence. The Benevolent Fund, which was intended to secure a provision for widows and orphans, is in a deplorable state. The Planter's Journal says, that this does not arise from any lack of the spirit of charity and benevolence in that body,—only that charity and benevolence are not visible, as in a vast sphere, only we do not hear it. The twin association of the Zemindars born about the same time, is in a far less unenviable plight. We have heard nothing of its operation, or even of its existence for more than a twelve month, which leads to the conclusion that there is nothing so short-lived or inactive as indigenous patriotism.

—The Governor General had a levee on the 6th of January on his way to Meerut, and the whole force was dispersing rapidly. The only items of particular interest from that quarter are that the Governor General had a long preliminary visit to Lady Sale, attended only by a companion, A. D. C.; and that the Commander-in-Chief had given a great dinner, at which Major Pettigrew was present, from which we infer that as witnesses are Political and not Military, Sir J. Napier has no official scruples at inviting him to dinner pending his trial.

—The Court Martials are going on—and we suppose off—eventually, as a correspondent of the Hurkar announces. In some cases the officers have not even been called on for their defence. Col. Blythe, Capt. Hays, and two other officers have been acquitted. The charges, says this correspondent, were so worded that they could hardly fail to get off. Yet in the case of Pettigrew they were worded, as if with a design that he should be convicted.

—It is said that authentic intelligence has been received of the death of Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly at Bahawal. They are reported to have been thrown into dungeons, where the rebels quickly devoured them. We have so frequently heard of Col. Stoddart's destruction, that the intelligence must come in a most questionable shape before it can be regarded as authentic.

—We think the weakest reason which has been yet advanced against the appointment of Major Broadbent, "the first of men," as we have seen him emphatically called, is contained in the following evasive obelisk. "The Barmecide and poor inhabitants of Tenasserim, who saw that Officer but the other day as a pretty Officer, leaning his head and back, and who know nothing of his great military deeds in Afghanistan, will naturally suppose, that he made good pickings as a commissary, and lifted high to be raised at once to the chief over them. Such events they have often witnessed under the rule of the Golden Foot, and we ought not to let them suspect even, that a similar case could possibly occur under the British Government."

—As our Summary of last Wednesday was thrown out for want of room, we now mention that the sentence on the first Native Rebel leader, executed in the Supreme Court, was, that he should pay a fine of 500*l.* be confined six months in jail, and find securities himself in 1000*l.* and two others in 800*l.* each. The punishment is severe, but not more so than the greatness and wantonness of the offences merited.

—The statue of the Marquis of Wellesley, voted by the inhabitants of Calcutta in 1838, which had been executed by Bacon, is now at the end of forty years on its way to this country, just after we have heard of the death of that illustrious statesman.

—The London Mail was expected at Bombay between the 10th, and the 12th and it is hoped may possibly arrive in the course of this day.

—We regret to record the death of an aide-de-camp of Chelms, of Major General Foster Walker.

—The Esplanade in his editorial column states, that Printed Books may be taken to England free of duty. We shall be very happy to find that our contemporary is correct, but we fear the news is too good to be true. The restriction into England of books, which had been exported from it, used to be fettered with a duty of three pence a pound, equivalent to the drawback allowed on the exportation of them. We believe now is a general impression that all English books taken home are still liable to duty, though it is less than it formerly was; and many who have collected valuable libraries here are anxious to derive from sending them home, lest them to the nation when they sell for less than an old song. We wish some of our Librarians would illuminate our darkness on this point.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21.

—The Queen has arrived from China, with accounts of a very serious outbreak at Canton, where a mob of ten thousand men had assembled together and burnt down the British Hong. We have published the most comprehensive account we could find of it, among the Journals which have reached us; but it is evidently written by one belonging to the Chinese Government, who has disposed to admit that the Riot may in part be traced to the impudence of the merchants. The transports with a large portion of the troops had been dispatched to Canton, and the Queen, which was to steam the vessels through the Straits.

—The Twelfth annual examination of the students in the General Assembly's Institution took place yesterday at the Town Hall, in the presence of a large number of the most influential members in European and Native society.

—Letters from the Punjab state, that the small pox was raging there with great violence, and that nearly five in a hundred perished.

—Hastings Cowjee is about to give a farewell party to the Prinsep, who, after having taken a prominent part in the political transactions of this empire, for the last twenty-five years, since he accompanied Lord Hastings as his Secretary during the first war, is now about to retire to his native land.

MONDAY, JANUARY 22.

—The Hurkar publishes a letter from Berrow, on the Banks of the Indus, dated the 2d of January. The letters of interested persons are interesting. Sir C. Napier's camp is in the neighbourhood of Khyberpoor. He has with him a force of 8000 Bombay troops. No one (Lahore) has been able to capture the camp. He is about to whether Scinde is to be conquered or not. Shikarpore, which under our protection would have become an important commercial depot, and the focus of trade beyond the Indus, having been abandoned, the natives have pulled down every house we had built, to efface every trace of the Feringees. The same was said of Quetta and Dellar, both which places have been plundered. At Candahar the people are ready to tear each other to pieces, and are arming the refugees Hindoostanes to repel the violence of Surfer Jung. The letter says, that the disturbances in Scinde have been more magnified, and that every thing has gone wrong since Major Outram left it. It also affirms, that Sir Charles Napier had put in orders, that he would hang the officers found plundering their own hands; and turn the common soldiers over to the tender mercies of the Provost Marshal of his army.

—The following extract will be read with deep interest.

"As a proof that the feeling of good comradeship between the 13th Light Infantry and the 35th Native Infantry is genuine, four of the former died a sick army in the last corps, several miles on their shoulders, being left behind on one of the marches, by some mistake; and no joke either,—the poor fellow being in the last stage of consumptive malady."

—Lord Ellenborough is to be at Meerut on the 29th, and at Delhi about the beginning of February, when it is said to be his intention to depose the first of his own hands; and turn the common soldiers over to the tender mercies of the Provost Marshal of his army.

—We regret to find from the Madras papers, that the Rev. Mr. Spring has been removed by death, after a residence of twenty-six years in India.

—Letters from the banks of the Sutledge state, that Dost Mahomed was still at Ludiana, and had not moved towards Afghanistan, and that he was in expectation of the military assistance from our Government. Lord Ellenborough might, beside Lord Ivory in the outer house, and in the inner house, as Junior Lord Ordinary. Lord Jeffrey in consequence took his seat on the bench of the first division, in the room of Lord Gillies.

Mr. Fox Maule has been elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University, by a majority in all the "nations," his opponent being the Marquis of Bute. Mr. Maule was supported by the Non-transmutists, the Marquis by the Alchemists.

The Scottish Ecclesiastical college is to be built in the neighbourhood of the Marquis of Cairn, belonging to George Paton, Esq., and volunteers who made a gratuitous offer of sufficient ground for the purpose. It will stand on a good elevation, and command an extensive prospect.

The Penny Illustration says, we grieve to say that the number of the unemployed is still rising. Last week it was 17,022; this week it is 17,072; during an increase of 50.

Our accounts from America are not of very general interest. The cabinet would, it is stated, be reorganized before the meeting of Congress in December. Mr. Webster would retire from it, and Mr. Calhoun would occupy his seat. Mr. Spencer and Mr. Webster were both mentioned as candidates for the office of Secretary of State. Mr. Webster was to have an address to the city, which he had pronounced an address to him. His reply was short, but eloquent, and it gave general satisfaction.

Mr. Dickens's book had arrived out, and given great offence to our Transatlantic neighbours. The statements contained in it leave no doubt, they say, that the offensive article in the Foreign Quarterly Review on the American press was the production of the same pen.

The papers state, as a proof of the bad colour which the exert of the government is held, that while bills on the executive of the United States could only be negotiated at three per cent. discount (thirty days' sight), at Hawaiian private bills at sixty days' sight were negotiated at two per cent. premium.

At Jerusalem, a duel between Judge Tenney and Mr. N. C. Rowley was in train of preparation. It was to take place on the Arabian shore, opposite to Prince Tenney's residence. The duel was to be armed with a rifle, a pair of duelling pistols, and a bow-knife. The rifle was to be discharged at 99 paces' distance, then to advance at pleasure, to the fall of one of the combatants. If the duel was to be through a decision of Judge Tenney, at the Circuit Court in Concordia, affecting Mr. Rowley's property. This is quite an improvement on the duel in principle. It is to be decided by the Judge. Should the Judge receive a rifle ball through the head, we presume it will be held that his decision was wrong, and ought to be set aside. On the other hand, should his honour succeed in plunging a bow-knife straight deep into the thorax of Mr. Rowley, the law of the jungle will stand good, and the equity of his decision be unquestionable.

The Advertiser thus announces the ceremony of the closing of the protocol:—"The representatives of Great Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, assembled in London, on Nov. 19, in order to consider on the treaty of Dec. 9, 1841, relative to the suppression of the slave-trade. The French government having communicated its firm resolution not to ratify the treaty, the four plenipotentiaries, after having purely and simply verified the refusal of France, declared in the name of their respective courts, that they maintained all the clauses of the treaty, and that they closed definitively the protocol."

General Vandermere, who was implicated in the late Belgian conspiracy, escaped from prison at Brussels on the 7th of Nov. disguised in his wife's clothes. The King of the Belgians effected his escape also. A letter from the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, dated Aix-la-Chapelle, 19th, announces his safe arrival on the Prussian territory (and at the same time on the Dutch frontier) on his way to join his father, King Leopold. He is said to be more fortunate than Madame L. exalts. The General is obviously proud of his wife, and thinks that England ought to be equally proud of having given birth to such a man. She is the daughter of the late Aulic Chamberlain.

Funchal, the capital of Madeira and the wharf of the island, had been visited with one of the most dreadful storms this country has known since the year 1603, when upwards of 400 persons were swept into the sea.

The death of the Rev. Dr. Sander, Lord Bishop of Cashel and Waterford, a man of the purest and most elevated character, and who might truly be described as an ornament to the Church, took place at his residence, on 16th Nov. in Kinsale. He was 82 years of age. He had long been a Fellow of the University of Dublin, and was elevated to the See of Cashel by the late Government.

Mr. William Hone, the well-known author of the

"Every-Day Book," and other popular works, died on 16th Nov., after a long illness and much suffering, which he bore with the most exemplary patience.

In his early life he was celebrated as one of the first satirical writers of the day; his "Political House," that "Jack built," went through upwards of 50 editions, and it is said that, during his lifetime, and similar works the name of George Cruikshank was first established. By putting one of his satires into the form of the lyrics of the Church hymn, he was presented with a testimonial, and his trial before Lord Ellenborough, which lasted three days, and in which he successfully defended himself in person, with the greatest ability, may be considered one of the most brilliant of his country. When Dr. Stoddart re-established the paper, now extinct, called the New Times, Mr. Hone furnished an admirable burlesque of it, in the form of a newspaper called the "Sleep at Noon," by which he gave a nickname to, and effectively demolished, that very frothy and pompous person. Having abandoned his career as a satirist, he appeared in later years as the editor of the "Every-Day Book," the "Year Book," and the "Table-Book," three works, all on the same principle of giving antiquarian information in a popular form, and of exhibiting the indefatigable perseverance and research of Mr. Hone. The "Every-Day Book," in which the information given is connected with the days in the year, may be considered the most valuable of his works. Towards the close of his life, he became one of the conductors of the Patriot newspaper, and in this situation he continued till increasing infirmity, occasioned not so much by age as by the exertions he had made, caused him to retire from every active pursuit.

Mr. J. Hollins, and Mr. F. Grant were elected associates.—Lord Wrottesley has lately finished the erection of an astronomical observatory on his estates near Wolverhampton.—The public will be sorry to hear that Captain Basil Hall, R.N., whose literary and professional eminence are so widely known, is in a condition of mind and body; the most painful to contemplate.

Mr. J. Miles, in a letter to the Editor of the Times, says, "It is perfectly true that such an instance of exhibiting the indestructible power of force, totally distinct from the principle of balloons; that a working model has been shown me, which, by its action, appears to establish the perfect practicability of travelling through the air, and of being complete and simple in its construction, and the construction of its parts so extraordinary, that little doubt remains that the important results of the invention will be fully achieved. I venture to recommend that the first carriage will be ready for operation early in the ensuing year: it is therefore, however individuals to await the development of this wonderful invention, which it may become an important subject for consideration as to the changes that will result to society, whether under the control of the government, or in the hands of a public company."

Letters and papers from Bombay, 1st Oct., via Marseilles, reached London on the 8th November; those by way of Falmouth were delivered in London on the 11th November. News of the peace with China, and the capture of Cabul, reached London by express from Paris on the 21st November, and the particulars were published on the 23d November; on the morning of which day the triumph of our arms in India and China were communicated to the Queen at Windsor Castle, by a special messenger despatched from Downing Street.

A letter to the Lord Mayor of London from Lord Stanley, communicated on 23d November, the intention, that "it has pleased Almighty God to bestow His most merciful blessing on the complete conquest of the Empire of China has been applied to recognize the claims of Great Britain."

On the direction of the War Office, the Park and Tower guns, so far as to celebrate the receipt of the news from the East, and especially from China. It was reported that the war in Afghanistan had ended, and that on the conclusion of the treaty, a day will be appointed for a general holiday, an illumination, with fire works at the Park, and other amusements, similar to the celebration of the peace of 1815, in the evening, the Metropolitan church is to ring.

The news should be immediately affixed in the city by a flag in the case of the cotton-market. The cotton market, and the price of the cotton, is said to be in a state of great uncertainty, and the price of a penny per pound was established.

The news of peace with China immediately gave a stimulus to trade in the manufacturing districts. It was received in Liverpool with living interest, and the ringing of bells and the firing of guns at once assumed a brisker appearance. In Manchester prices of goods sent to the Eastern markets were raised; and as the stock of goods in the yards are now low, every impulse tells strongly. On receipt of Sir J. Graham's letter to the Lord Justice Chief, the guns of the Admiralty Castle fired a salute, and the city bells were rung by order of the Lord Provost and Magistrate; and in Dublin the victories obtained in India and China were hailed by the entire garrison, and the bells of the Protestant and Roman Catholic churches.

At a meeting of the corporation of Dublin, Town-councillor Symonds moved a resolution to the effect, that the freemen of the city of Dublin, on Sir John Lubbock, Bart., Lord North, George Pollock, and Lieut. Gaddy, Esq. Regt. The resolution being seconded, a gallant town-councillor (Mr. Fitzpatrick) begged to move that a Resolution should be passed, that the Corporation of Dublin should have a precedent in case, a similar instruction having been conferred on the daughter of Aberdeen, during the late rebellion. Owing, however, to the lateness of the hour, the resolution was not carried, and there being some doubts whether the right of granting the freedom by "grace especial" still existed in the new corporation, the subject was deferred till the next day of assembly.

The highly satisfactory and glorious news from China and India seems to have awakened, if it ever sleep, the rancour of the Paris press against this country. With some exception, which we must not mention to name (the Journal des Debats), the papers before us are filled with the most virulent, and in fact ridiculous attacks against the "English." Towards the close of the war was being conducted, and upon the grasping policy in which it had originated.

The Rev. Thomas Robinson, M.A., Lord Almoner's preacher, and the Rev. John W. Cambridge, and late Archbishop of Madras, has been elected morning preacher at the Finsbury Hospital.

The Liverpool Standard says on the authority of a letter from Poona, that the murderer of Lord Norbury has been discovered and arrested at that place in the person of a private soldier in the East India Company's artillery, who ceased his conscience by confessing his crime.

The shareholders of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company held a meeting on the 30th Nov., at which a dividend of 84 per cent. for the last six months, or as at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, was declared. The directors in their report, a luminous and well-digested document, congratulate their constituents on being enabled, by the steady increase of the traffic of the company, to maintain the rate of dividend, and before paid, and this at a period when all other establishments of a similar character have complained of a diminution of receipts from the unsatisfactory condition of commerce.

The number of European Spectators was numerous—that of Native Spectators very numerous and not a little noisy, now and then. Portions of the three successful Essays given in for Mr. Deane's prize were read on the day of examination; as also portions of the Essays which gained Dr. Charles's prizes. The Bengali Essay on Female education was also read.

NOTIFICATION BY THE RIGHT HONORABLE THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

Camp Proceedings, Dec. 31, 1845.—This day the troops which had returned from Canton to the Army of Reserve, were reviewed by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

The whole force afterwards passed in column before the Governor-General.

The Governor-General was accompanied by the Koonpur Peshwa Singh, son of the Maharajah of Lahore, the Rajah Dhin Singh, the Minister of the Rajah of Benares, and the Rajah of Nepal, now on a mission from the Maharajah, as well as by the Rajah of Jhansi, and other chiefs of the province 15th Sikhs.

The force reviewed, consisted of nine battalions of Europeans, and 10 battalions of native infantry, (including Broadfoot's Bappers); of 2 regiments of Europeans, and of 2 native cavalry, besides detachments, and of 17 batteries of artillery, comprising 112 guns.

Four battalions of infantry remained in camp. The regiment of Kelat-i-Ghilzie carried, for the first time, the colours presented to it by the Governor-General, already inscribed with the words, "Kelat-i-Ghilzie," "Caudahar," "Ghuznee," and "Candahar," in commemoration of the services which have justly obtained for it the honor of being permanently attached to the Bengal Army.

The troops were all in the finest order, and the horses in good condition for any service.

After the review, the Europeans and Sikhs, and thirty thousand acres of their favorite battalions were distributed to the native regiments.

Major-General Sir Charles Napier lately reviewed the troops, under his command, at Sakkar.

The Major-General has concentrated at this place, and in its immediate vicinity, 12 regiments of infantry, 2 regiments of cavalry, and an ample force of artillery.

One European and 3 native regiments occupy Kurmabee.

Two Steam Vessels transferred from the Euphrates, have been already directed to the Indus, where they will now be employed.

A force of 14,000 men, well composed and amply provided with artillery, to which the Maharajah's Infantry has added from his own army, 3 regiments of Infantry and 1 of cavalry, with guns, which his Highness has placed under the command of a British Officer, will effectually preserve the tranquillity so established in Bundeekand, and extend it to Sangar and the Sagar and the Sagar.

In both districts the principal chiefs assiduously co-operated with the British Officers in the pursuit of plunderers, and for the apprehension of all who have disturbed the peace of the country.

Two regiments of Europeans and 4 of native infantry, which formed part of the force, lately employed in the operations against China, have been immediately disposable by the Government of a power upon our own terms, of which the Chinese Government evinces every disposition fully to execute the conditions, and the native regiments are already on their return to India.

By order of the Right Honorable the Governor General of India,

T. H. MADDOCK,
Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General.

CHINA.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM CANTON.

Canton, Dec. 8th, 3 P. M.
"After a night of much anxiety and excitement, I send you a line to say that we are all safe, and the danger apparently over for the present."

Before this reaches you you will have heard that a row commenced at 9 or 10 yesterday morning between some Europeans and Chinese, which went on increasing through the day, until at night it reached a fearful crisis. We early sent notice to Hongkong, but his report, if made any, was not heeded.

The mob increased in numbers and audacity every hour, and by 2 or 3 we could see by the plunder carried off, that Mr. Alarum's dinner had been forced.

The ladies (English) had already taken refuge at Kingman's. This scene of plunder and violence went on through the afternoon, a feeble party of the British troops sent out to restore order, being beaten off the field.

Early in the evening the Anti-English feeling began to show itself in the setting fire to the British flag staff, and the concentration of the look on the company's factory. Matters getting thus serious, old Mingqua politely sent a chair, the ladies (American) were taken to safety, whence the kindly promised they should be taken to his family home, in case of necessity. Soon after they had been comfortably placed there, the smoke appeared issuing from the interior of the British long, and in a few minutes the fire in the secondary mow had fired that factory. We were now attended to Mingqua's terrace whence we had a full view of the sea and splendid configuration.

The lights of Mr. Marrow's house and the chapel bell tower beautifully for a while, till they sank in the flames. The verandah still stood firm, but suddenly volumes of smoke poured from every crevice, and the fire was now in the roof and archway was burning furiously. The square all the while was crowded by Chinese who had early thrown down the company's wall and forced many passengers to flee.

Alarms were from time to time communicated to this immense mass, and then at one moment fled in all directions, and then swayed back again to their former position. Factions and shouts were every instant mingled with the crackling of the fire and the crash of the falling ruins. The fire extended slowly back into No. 4, but happily the night was nearly calm, and the slight breeze which the configuration made veered a little to the eastward; this and the strong west walls of the British long, saved the factories on our side of Victoria (Hog) place, but insured the destruction of those eastward. It was evident the Dutch and Crook house must go, and our concern for the inmates of the former was increased by the report of a fire arm that quarter which several times reached us. The fire engines sent to check the flames were driven off, the mob declaring no one should interfere to save the British long, and when that was over, they declared they would save the others—This with the eastern factories was impossible; and Mr. Heard and party, after defending their entrance against the thieves for some hours, were finally obliged to escape by the back passage about 11 o'clock. Happy they effected this in safety; and soon after the flames running along the verandah, consumed it, and now of those who were perched upon the roof, lying flat on the lower arched and some broken pillars. Of course the Crook long shared the same fate.

While the fire was still intense there, smoke issuing from Mr. Fisher's showed that that also had been consumed. to open his gates when we wished to return to our society.

Towards dawn there was a full fire in the popular violence, and it was determined that the ladies and a large escort should take Misses's head, and proceed down to Whampoa, which they accomplished without molestation; the rest of us, after an early breakfast, returned to our factories, which we found quite as we left them. But again, as the morning advanced, the mob collected, rammed full possession of the square, and renewed their work of plunder. They had now evidently found entrance into our houses. In the afternoon, the ladies were appearing in quick succession laden with dollars. This agitation took was, however, seldom left in their quiet possession; every suspicion of fellow was soon aroused, seized, and the dollars scattered in the sunnle to be scrambled for by the by-standers; for hours the square was covered by knotted groups of this kind, exclaiming desperately for a share in the plunder. By and by the police and hong coolies mingled in the fray, for the purpose of spalling and punishing the villains. Thus the morning wore away, and no interference came from the government. No doubt the governor passed an anxious night, ready to interfere, but dreading the power of the popular party. In the course of the morning he learned the true state of the case; that the factories were not all burned, nor the foreigners all murdered, and that the portion of the mob which had the burning of the factories for its object was dissipated, and that he had only the thieves to contend with; he, therefore, ventured to interfere, and a strong body of soldiers at length appeared at about noon, and the mob dispersed. The lawless fellows who had been more than 24 hours in possession of it. It was pleasant to rally forth for us and we went down to the seat of the conflict, where five dead bodies of Chinese, torn and bloody, showed that some at least had not escaped to run riot again. Numbers of wretches soon came wringing from the burning houses, evidently thieves, yet we saw none apprehended; the officers seemed content to scatter them.

Thus ended this disgraceful affair for the present, for we were not to be molested again by the force of the foreign residents, and new efforts to fire and plunder may be apprehended. We are now putting our merchandise on board a ship, and shall go off to-morrow. An excursion was sent with the authorities. An engine was sent to him yesterday, and we wait to see whether he will choose to explain away the difficulties of the rowdies, or challenge them to a fight to the death, or to the death. It is clear that either the native or foreign officers must afford protection, or we cannot return to the factories.

The British flag is an object of much interest through the evening. It was fired at the base, the flames crept slowly up the staff, which still stood steadfast until the fire reached the top, then the cross piece detained and increased the flames until the staff burnt through and the topmost slowly toppled down: a loud shout from the mob marked their triumph when it fell.

As to the commencement of the row, the Ladies' fight was merely the exciting occasion; it has been evident to us for some time that a growing discontent was abroad. I hear some who have been foolish enough to ascribe the discontent to the arrival of the ladies: it is the working of the popular mind and passions as to the late war, which has been the torch but not convinced here, nor, perhaps, anywhere. Now, perhaps, the real difficulties of the China question commences.

The leaders of the patriotic party lately applied to the governor for arms: he refused; they requested permission to arm themselves: he evaded this petition; they have now tried fire, and in time may succeed guns."

We have also seen two letters written by an English gentleman, which enable us to compare these too highly respectable sources of intelligence.

The English ladies state that the riot began on the forenoon of the 7th inst., with a pretence now between some Chinese and Lascars (it is said a Lascar stole an orange); the latter were obliged to retreat to the barracks. The Chinese then attacked Mr. Marrow's house, where two English ladies resided, breaking the windows and battering the doors, and soon effecting an entrance, being interrupted, they longed to escape, but carried off every thing they could find. The ladies were dressing for dinner when the assault commenced, and were hurried away, without their gowns, in slippers. At the time of the riot, some time the mob attacked Mr. Heard's factory, but with less fury until they had seen the British factory and Mr. Marrow's house on fire; they then attacked Mr. Heard's house in greater force and with increased fury, and every effort was required to prevent their doing mischief.

With Mr. Heard were his partner, Mr. Dirlwell, Mr. Humpston, Messrs. Jardine, Matheson, and Co.'s tea inspector, Mr. Heald and his companions had only two muskets and two pistols, and a very scanty supply of ammunition; thus they were obliged to reserve their fire until required by absolute necessity for their safety.

Repeated applications were made to Humpston, the senior long merchant, for help, which he at first promised in a few minutes, but it never came. The mob set fire to Mr. Heard's front or outer door, and broke down the entrance door leading into the passage, but Mr. Heard and his companions prevented them from acting the entrance door on fire by throwing water on it. Here were hundreds of the Chinese mob pulling down the walls, and throwing white bricks through the windows, opposed only by three or four Americans and Englishmen, armed with two muskets and two pistols, with a little powder and shot. How easily, then, could the Tartar guard have dispersed them: indeed, the alarms that spread in the above letter, prove they were in dread that their lawless violence would be interrupted by the arrival of troops and the terrors of the law.

The passage of Mr. Heard's house was open to them; but whenever they advanced a ball from the market laid one of their number on the ground either dead or wounded, and they then retreated. Finding their attempts to gain entrance baffled, and excited by disappointment, defeat, and revenge, they set fire to the Creek house; thus Mr. Heard and his companions had fire on each side. They were driven out of the house by the fire, and succeeded in reaching the Fort as they were in safety. On returning the next morning they found that the treasury had been broken open, and three lakhs of dollars plundered.—Some boats having arrived from Whampoa, with the assistance of their crews the robbers were driven off the premises, and what they had looted of the treasury was removed.

Messrs. Gibb, Livingston and Co.'s factory was also plundered of $40,000.—London Register, December 13.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

THE JUBILEE OF THE BAPTIST MISSION is an occasion on which evangelical Christians of other denominations have "rejoiced with them that do rejoice." Yet, although the sacredness of the occasion, and the of the Universal Church furnish the theme of special gratulation, yet they are efforts which, whether their character or their extent be regarded, must equally call forth the devout thanksgiving of every society of that Church retaining a just perception of its common obligations to the world at large. A further reason why Christians of other names may well rejoice with their Baptist brethren, is furnished by the facts, that there is no body of British Christians entertaining Scriptural notions of the person and office of the incarnate Son of God, that has not long since practically recognized the duty involved in his "Great Commission," by entering upon the field of missionary labor; and that the Lord of the vineyard has vouchsafed the same reward to such as have engaged in it at periods a little subsequent, as he has bestowed upon those who were almost the first to place themselves in this manner at his disposal. In the numerous Jubilee Meetings which have been held during the last few years, nothing has delighted us so much, as to observe the affectionate manner in which Ministers of various denominations have commingled with their Baptist brethren, and the cordial terms in which their fraternal sympathies have been reciprocated. It has been remarked, by one who has enjoyed the rare privilege of witnessing the birth of the Baptist Mission, and of becoming the honored historian of the first self-constituted society of its benevolent career, that, had not the Missionary efforts of other Societies been as successful as those of its own, it would have been to him a year of mourning. The sentiment does honor to the speaker; with whom we congratulate our readers of every class, that the fact is the converse of the supposition, and that, inasmuch as the first self-constituted crowd the labours of one branch of the Church is but a sample of the prosperity which has attended all the others, it may be equally rapidly repeated.

The rise and progress of the Baptist Mission is a subject for instructive, as well as delightful contemplation; and we are glad that those who are interested in the cause, will be aided in their meditations by Dr. Cox's admirable History. When we consider the fact, that he founded the Society, and initiated its first operations! As apostles in their poverty as the Apostles themselves; apostles (to speak a phrase then current) from the loins and from the anvil!" but, what was best of all, proving their apostolicity by the spirit in which they entered upon the proper work of the Gospel, and with their own personal trials and sufferings, entered upon the task of "going into all the world, and preaching the Gospel to every creature!" "Attempt great things, and expect great grace from God!"—was the motto which their leader gave them; and nobly did they and he abide by the spirit of the lofty sentiment. Nothing less than a Confession could convey their words to posterity. Wide was the sphere of their experimental effort; and the Jubilee of their success finds their successors, true to the spirit of their institution, meditating the subjugation of another Continent to the Cross of Christ. No world, may deem this Quixotic; but it is the true heroism. The great things to be attempted, were for God; and the great things to be expected, were from God. Hence lay the reason why it was ridiculous to ridicule an enterprise, in which the means and the end appeared as hopelessly unequal. The vindication of the Cause and the Fallers was then to be sought in the spirit in which they began the enterprise—in their entire distrust of themselves, in their simple obedience to the Divine Command, in their implicit dependence upon the Spirit of God, and in the faith and the urgency with which they were called to press for His blessing upon their plans and exertions. Their vindication now is in the results. They attempted great things for God, and they attained great things from God; and they have not been disappointed in their expectations, but have faithfully looked only at the material means employed, is wholly inapplicable, but plain evidence to those who have observed and can appreciate the spirit in which the work was originated and has been carried on. The extent to which the labours of Carey and his associates have benefited the social, moral, literary, and scientific interests of the untold millions of the East, is too vast to be estimated; although some notion may be formed of it, when we remember their various achievements by means of the Press, and in promoting, as they mainly did, the abolition of Slavery and Infidelity. But these are the smallest advantages which they have conferred upon that vast Continent, and may be regarded as trifles in comparison of the infinite good which must accrue from their stupendous and blessed labours in the translation of the Word of God into the difficult dialects of those countless nations. Nor are the more recent exertions of their brethren in the West unworthy of being associated in celebration with those of the Carey and the Marshmans in the East. For who can deny the Jubilee of the Baptist Mission, without recognizing the fact, that they share its agents had in striking off the fetters of the negro, and in giving, at the same time, civil liberty and spiritual freedom to living tens of millions of their sable fellow-creatures. No world, may deem this of the spirit of the fathers continue to inspire their sons, and if they continue to make large attempts, and to effect large enterprises, and to receive large benedictions, to found those attempts and those expectations upon the Divine glory and the Divine blessing, their success in Africa will be as illustrious as it has been in India, and the benefits conferred upon her aboriginal inhabitants as glorious and extensive as those which have been dispensed among her exiled sons.

There is one feature in the history of the Baptist Mission, which it may be useful at the present juncture to call up to special view. We refer to the anti-sectarian spirit of its founders, and to the response which that spirit uniformly met from Christians of other denominations. Those who are familiar with the facts will remember how entirely free from any narrowness of view, and how ready those who have themselves to be in their plans and projects. They had imbibed the true and pure missionary spirit, which seeks only the diffusion of the Gospel without seeking of any benefit or honour. So much was this the case, that any one really engaged in Christian Mission was as welcome to participate in their little funds, as those of their own name. And of the fact, that they themselves as candidates for the honorable work. The Moravians, for example early shared in their small but cordial bounty. True liberality never less its reward; and the fact, that the Moravians and the Hymans accompanied throughout the Union of King's, that never was a Missionary Society instituted by the liberalists of the Baptist Church, and the fact of Pao-baptist churches. Right glad were we to hear the frank and generous terms in which this fact was acknowledged by the Rev. John Aldin, in his splendid speech at Exeter, in 1837. "The Moravians have been better timed; and we unfeignedly believe that he spoke the voice of the great body of his brethren. We fervently trust, that the admirable spirit which has pervaded those noble institutions will not only prove auspicious to the interests of the Body more immediately concerned, but will tend also, along with other benevolent influences, such, for example, as Mr. James' call to unite—to go out and to be baptized in the national jealousies and misunderstandings, and to unite all evangelical Christians in the bonds of that brotherhood, without the visible exhibition of which, as we are taught by Christ himself, our missionary exertions cannot reach the crown of complete success. As the Jubilee of the Baptist Mission has happily witnessed the perfect healing of that unhappy division which once threatened our disaster to its most important interests, may its Centenary be hence sustained by the entire removal of every cause and symptom of difference among the various branches of the missionary agency, and the year Eighteen Hundred and Ninety-two be celebrated by the coming celebration of all our churches, not as the Centenary of this or the other Society, so much as the Centenary of the year in which the Christians of England woke to the duty of attempting the conversion of the world.

But we hope we shall not have to wait another half-century before the churches are again called upon to sound the trumpet of Missionary Jubilee. That noble institution, the London Missionary Society, has nobly completed the tenth decade of its existence. Although it owed its birth to the Baptist Society, it has in some respects outstripped it in its career; and, in some aspects of its achievements, might tempt a partial admirer to the pardonable exclamation, O mètre pûche! file pûche! But we discern all invidious comparisons. The two Institutions were brought into being by one common impulse; or, if there be a question of parentage between them, the nearness of their ages may remind us of those phenomena in real life, in which relationship and sympathy are reduced to sympathy as well as seeming, to that equality of circumstances which results in the delightful associations of a sisterly companionship. But to come to the point. If there be any difference in the views we may be permitted to anticipate the celebration of the Jubilee of the London Missionary Society. Our Wesleyan friends allowed the first half-century of their existence to pass away without any celebration, preferring, it would seem, to wait the completion of a century before they took a jubilant review of their useful career. We trust our friends in Bloomfield-street will follow the example of their Baptist brethren. Assuredly, they need wait no longer for matter of adequate rejoicing. If the Baptist Missionaries have been distinguished by their indomitable perseverance, those of the London Society have been equally remarkable for their untiring activity. What the former have accomplished in the way of translation for one-half of Asia, India, that have the latter effected for the other half of the continent in the way of the abolition of slavery, the successes of the one at the Cape, correspond to those of the other in Jamaica; while, if these can reduce by tens of thousands their converts in the Islands of the continent, the latter keep pace with them in the Islands of the Pacific. But that which distinguishes the London Missionary Society above all kindred contemporary institutions, is the far-reaching hand with which it has entered the seats of Christian civilization. Its voyagers and travellers have traversed more seas, and penetrated far deeper into the wilds of barbarism, than any other messengers of truth and mercy; and, in Missionary Literature, its trophies are without a parallel in number, splendour, and importance. These are our honest ostentations; and we doubt not, that on the Jubilee of the London Missionary Society is celebrated, we shall have to record it as the universal acclaim, not only of its own adherents, but of the whole Missionary Republic. Many dangers have done us virtuously, but those excellet them all!

HYMN FOR THE MISSIONARY JUBILEE.

By JAMES MONTEAGUE.

O be joyful, every nation!
Hail thee with sacred mirth,
When the trumpet of jubilee
Sounds the Jubilee of earth,
And creation

Tremble with the world's new birth.

Then the north in darkness shrouded,
Jacob's rising star
And the eastern morn, unclouded,
Bring the Sun of Righteousness,
Cheering, healing

Shine with in the Baptist's distaff.

Then her worthy sons and daughters,
Afric to the Cross shall bring;

And the angel of the west
Hear the coral lands sing
"Hallelujah!"

Till the whole Pacific ring.

O thou everlasting Father,

Give the kingdom to thy Son!

He that died that he might gather
All God's children into one;

For the travail

Of his soul, let this be done.

Yes, it must be; Thou hast spoken,

And thy covenant shall hold;

Though the arch of heaven were broken,

And the earth's foundations cast

Down to abysses,

Yet thy word, O God! stands fast.

On thy holy hill of Zion.

Thou hast then ordained his end?

Now, to Judah's conquering lion,

Lay all foes beneath his feet,

Till his armies

In eternal triumph meet.

We have joined their marching legions;

Where our fathers fought, we fight;

Slavery's cane-lands, Balaam's regions,

Are exulting at the sight;

Freedom, freedom

Comes with Gospel life and light!

All the languages of Babel

Weapons for this warfare yield;

And with thee we well are able,

By the Spirit's aid, to wield,

In the battle,

Truth's sharp sword and faith's strong shield.

Thou through fifty years victorious,

Thou hast led our brethren on;

Are thine arms for deeds more glorious,

Till the latest field is won;

And all people,

Bow the knee and kiss the Son.—Pat.

MICHAELSCOE.

SEATCH OF THE LATE DUKE OF GORDON.

We understood that Mr. Campbell, of London, the distinguished sculptor to whom the execution of this work was confided, has just paid a visit to this city, for the purpose of giving this statue the benefit of his talents and skill those finishing touches which no hand save that of the artist can effectively impart. The statue, which is of Aberdeen granite, is 150 feet in height, and will be placed on a pedestal of equal elevation. His Grace is represented in military costume, leaning on his sword, and with one foot resting on a piece of ordnance. Around his shoulders is thrown a cloak, the folds of which are managed in the most graceful and effective style. The likeness of the lamented Duke has been preserved with singular fidelity; and every, the minutest, detail is given with extraordinary freedom and truth. This, we believe, is the first statue that has been executed in granite, in modern times. The experiment was, of course, rather hazardous, but it has been attended with complete success.—Aberdeen Paper.

LORD MORPETH AND THE AMERICANS.—It is said that Lord Morpeth is preparing his observations on the Americans for the press. The opinions of so distinguished a statesman, a politician, and a diplomatist, on a subject so much connected with the interests of our country, and our institutions, would be particularly useful at this period. All classes of politicians would look with anxiety to his views, and he is prepared to give his lordship's opinion with regard to the working of the ballot and "the man suffrage" in America—points that will inevitably be brought forward and discussed in the next session of Parliament.—Sheffield Times.

THE DUCHESS OF STIRLINGHAM. In order to co-operate with the Noble Duke in his efforts to extend education on His Grace's vast estates in Scotland, has given direction that the various schoolmasters should be sent to Edinburgh at her expense, for the purpose of being instructed in the system of education adopted at the Normal Schools there.—Pat.

THE COURT.—The two foreign "creatures" of King Leopold left in the family circle of the Court of St. James's—the Baroness Lehzen and Baron Strotz—have left in what may be called disgrace. On this subject, I possess some very curious information, but the time to reveal it has not yet arrived.—Independent.

RE-OPENING OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

This splendid edifice, which has been closed to the public since July last, is at length reopened for Divine Service. During the time it has been closed, the interior, which had become in a most dirty state, from the effects of the carbonic atmosphere and dust, has undergone a thorough cleansing. The choir, which had been constructed of solid old English oak, has been well scrubbed and newly varnished, and the drapery of the pulpit and the seats renewed. Many of the monuments had become nearly covered with moss, so as to prevent the public distinguishing the beauty of the sculptor's talent. They have been also well cleaned, that they have the appearance of just coming from the statuary's hands. The interior of the dome, and the magnificent lantern, are now seen to the greatest advantage, which previously presented but one mass of dust and black. The fine columns now have the appearance of black marble, and the mosaic pavement, which had been for years left to the view. The whole of the centre and the aisle, which had been enclosed with a screen, has now been opened to the public gratis during Divine Service, from 10 to 11, on A. M., and 3 till 4 P. M. A notice has been put up, requesting visitors not to write their names on the columns, as otherwise done there, under penalty of the severest punishment the law can inflict against Vandalism. Great complaints are made that the

THORNTON AND CO'S (BATH) BANKRUPTCY.—Saturday's Bath Herald states, that meetings of the creditors of the separate estates of Mr. H. W. Thornton and Mr. Phillott were held at the White Hart, in that city, on the 24th inst. We are informed that the Commissioners declared a dividend of 50s. in the pound under each estate. After these dividends are paid, a handsome surplus will be left for the benefit of the creditors of the separate estates. We are informed, however, that the creditors under Mr. Lowder's separate estate are not likely to receive more than a moiety of their claims, several of the charitable Societies for which Mr. Lowder was treasurer having proved against his private estate, in the not unfounded hope of thus securing a larger dividend than from the estate of the state firm. We are happy to add, that the Victoria Park Committee, the whole of the Bath and Walsley Diocesan Societies, and some other charitable Institutions, will be paid in full, having proved against the separate estates of both Phillott and Lowder, and thus have enabled to make their election.—Record.

EMERSON ELLIOTT AND THE CHARTISTS.

The following is a letter from Emerson Elliott, of Sheffield, the author of the Car-Law Magazine, to the Chartist Democratic Standard, dated 24th inst. It was the 24th of August last reached me this day in my fortnightly parcel from Sheffield. You ask me "if cessation from labour would be useful as a means of procuring the Charter?" I think it is a question, seriously put such a question to any man out of Bedlam! Universal cessation from labour is revolution; but it is necessarily involuntary—hence is unresistible force. You say, "if it is necessary, it is necessary, and enough to try; and voluntary cessation from labour being necessarily partial, would leave you further from your object than you are, if it is an honest one; for the less you labour the less you will have; and the less you have, the less able you will be to contend with your cunning and meretricious foes. The idea of obtaining the Charter by refusing to labour, is about as wise as the plan of C. Sells, of Birmingham, to procure it by abstaining from the use of tea and coffee, for which there are no substitutes in bread-land England; and that of the O.C. Committee, to destroy black-legislation by supporting the coal-miners in a strike, which, if your oppressors care one straw for any number of such stratagems, they are as senseless as yourselves; for your strike has smothered them, if they knew not before, that it is easier to stop a strike than to stop a revolution. To stop an equal breadth of oats. The broad takers, I suspect, originated your strike; and from the way in which you use the name of Sturge, I suspect you too, intend to support the coal-miners in a strike, which, if your oppressors care one straw for any number of such stratagems, they are as senseless as yourselves; for your strike has smothered them, if they knew not before, that it is easier to stop a strike than to stop a revolution. We regret to observe by an article in the Nationalist that extreme distress prevails at this moment on the trading classes of the French capital. The Journal states, that during the first 8 days of the present month more than 60,000 undergarments were sent from the Courts of Law had taken place in Paris among the commercial classes. "In this avalanche of commercial disasters," says the Nationalist, "is comprised the celebrated Café Anglais, one of the oldest and most celebrated establishments of the Metropolis. The extensive as well as small establishments fail. Affairs in general are under the influence of an alarming gloom. Every day are seen new groups closed on account of bankruptcy, particularly in the fashionable quarters."

PORTUGAL.—We have advices from Lisbon to the 26th inst. The granaries (analogous to our Hibernia Corps Art) had been suspended in the district of Marvão, public tranquillity was entirely restored, and the arms and accoutrements of the thirty rebellious soldiers had been given up on the frontier by the Spanish authorities.

Assassination was rife in Portugal, and the life of Coma Cabral was said to be threatened. The administration of justice was altogether deranged of contempt.

The accounts speak of the active exertions of the Papal Interimaries, M. Coppolani, and the religious intrigues which are now in progress.

A COMET.—The National announces that M. Laugier, a young astronomer attached to the Observatory of Paris, discovered, about seven o'clock in the evening of the 25th inst., a meteor in the constellation Uranus of a comet, extremely weak, and without the appearance of a tail. At two minutes past ten o'clock, Paris time, the right ascension of this star was 16 hours 31 minutes, and the boreal declination 68 degrees 44 minutes. The right ascension increased in 6 hours by 3 minutes 39 seconds time, and the declination diminished twenty minutes in the same interval.—Ibid.

THE HUSBAND ENHANCED.—Intelligence was received at Ashburnham house, yesterday, of the death of Prince Guizot, at Paris, on Friday last. The Prince was well-known in the highest circles at Paris and this country, and held command in the Imperial Guard.—Ibid.

WILL OF CARDINAL FERRE.—A letter from Ajaccio gives the following account of the will of the Cardinal Ferre, who died at Ajaccio, to which he has given rise. Among the specific and pecuniary legacies was one for founding at Ajaccio, the Cardinal's native city, an institute in which the direction of a religious community. For this purpose he bequeathed large masses in Corsica, considerable sums of money, and innumerable statues, books, paintings, and other works of art. The testator further directed the erection of a convent and church at Ajaccio, in which was to be formed a tomb for the interment of the Buonaparte family. By a Royal ordinance, dated the 2d of September, 1841, the city of Ajaccio was authorized to accept this bequest. However, on an investigation of the will preparatory to the carrying of these intentions into execution, it was discovered that there were certain technical formalities which prevented Ajaccio from receiving the bequests and carrying the unfulfilled intentions of the testator into execution. The will of Cardinal Ferre nominated his nephew Joseph, ex-lieutenant of Spain, as residuary legatee, and to whom all this valuable property consequently passed. Under these circumstances the city of Ajaccio made an appeal to the liberality of the Count de Surville, a nobleman of a truly noble spirit. On the 22d of September last he executed an act of donation, whereby he secured to the native city of his uncle nearly all the late Cardinal intended to endow it with. He bequeathed, gave a full length statue of Napoleon, and further granted, out of the vast gallery bequeathed to him by his uncle, numerous additional paintings, to be distributed among the poor towns of his native island, viz.—100 to be placed in the Royal College of Bastia, fifty in the town of Corte, in which he himself was born, and 150 to be divided by lot among other towns. But with regard to the church in which was to be interred the tomb for the Buonaparte family, he ordered its completion as long as that family should remain proscribed from France, considering it to be useless to erect a receptacle which might never be occupied.—Record.

AUSTRIA.—The Austrian Government has issued an order relative to the employment of children in manufactures. No child is to work longer than nine hours, and those that have been employed have been three years frequenting school, and receiving religious instruction. From nine to twelve years, children must not work more than ten hours. From twelve to sixteen, children must not work more than eleven hours, with one hour's interval. No boy or girl under sixteen to work at night.—Pat.

DANABOURG.—Among the appointments of Consuls lately signed by M. Guizot, we must particularly notice and praise (says the Univers) that of Count De Ratti Menton, who is transferred from the Consulate of Damascus to that of Canton. The latter is worth 40,000*fr.* a-year, and has acquired a great political importance, since the commencement of the hostilities of the English against China. By this distinction, M. Guizot, has proved that he shared the opinion of the Emperor Napoleon by M. Thiers regarding the propriety, courage, dignity, and perseverance, evinced by M. Ratti Menton, in the affair of the Jews who murdered Father Thomas. In sending our Consul at Canton to serve France in that post, the Government avenges him, in a becoming manner, for the attacks of the Journal des Débats, which, in the affair of the murder of Father Thomas, so unworthily betrayed the interests of religion and our nationality.

THE NEWSPAPER PRESS IN THE UNITED STATES.—Schools may be erected, east, west, north, and south, pupils be taught, and masters reaped by scores upon scores of thousands; cottages may be striven, churches may be crammed, temperance may be diffused, and advancing knowledge, in all other forms, walk through the land with giant step; but while the newspaper press of America is in, or near its present subject state, high moral improvement in that country is hopeless. Year by year, it must and will go back; year by year, the tone of public feeling will sink lower and down; year by year, the Congress and the Senate must become of less account before all decent men; and year by year the memory of the great fathers of the Republic must be esteemed more and more the bad life of their degenerate child. Among the herd of journals which are published in the States, there are some, the reader scarcely need be told, of character and worth. From periodicals of this accomplished gentlemen connected with publications of this class, I have derived both pleasure and profit. But the name of these is few, and of the others the legion, and the influence of the good is powerless to counteract the moral poison of the bad.—Dickens's American Notes.

ADVERTISEMENT.

AS the members of the present Christian Community at Lucknow form but a small portion of Colonel Low's friends, and there are many different parts of India who would gladly avail themselves of any opportunity of showing the estimation in which he is held by them, the Committee solicited by the subscribers at Lucknow beg to circulate for their information the proposal which was generally approved of by the Lucknow Community, and to assure those who may wish to inscribe, that they will have much pleasure in receiving their contribution to the Portrait.

To the Community at Lucknow.

As Lieut. Colonel Low, C. B. Resident at Lucknow is about to leave India, it is proposed that a subscription should be opened for the purpose of obtaining a Portrait of him to be executed by George Berchey, Esq. and kept in the Banquetting Rooms at Lucknow, in order to perpetuate the recollection of the many virtues which have adorned his public and private character, that have caused him to be universally esteemed and respected, and have enabled him to conciliate the good opinion of every one who has had the happiness of knowing him.

Persons desirous of subscribing are requested to put down their names with the amount of their subscriptions, and to vote for a Committee who will prepare and present an Address to Colonel Low, C. B. previous to his departure.

In accordance with the above proposal a Committee was formed at Lucknow, and an Address presented—and although before Col. Low's departure it was impossible to ascertain the probable amount of subscription, Mr. Berchey has had scarcely undertaken to paint the picture.

By order of the Committee,

Lucknow, 23d Dec. 1842. J. SPENCER LOUIS, Secretary.

EUROPEAN AND ORIENTAL AGENCY.

MR. PARKE PITTAR

HAVING arranged the formation of an Agency, the particular office of which will be the transaction of affairs, connected with this country and Europe, begs to offer his services to the community of India, in any way they can be rendered available.

A peculiar and important feature in the Agency put down, will consist in the return of Mr. P. Pittar to India. Taking advantage of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Steam Vessels, he purposes re-visiting Calcutta about the latter end of October, and returning to Europe about the middle of the following February, thus affording to persons entrusting the management of their affairs to his care, the opportunity of a personal conference and explanation of their views and intentions,—an advantage in the transaction of affairs of a complicated delicate or family nature, the goodness of which need not be commented upon.

A long residence in India, combined with an intimate knowledge of almost every description of manufactured article, and its various manufacturers, rendering him peculiarly fitted for the office of Agent to persons procuring their supplies or other articles, such as Table Equipage, Philosophical and Optical Instruments, Books, Maps, Sporting Apparatus, Musical Instruments, Military Equipments, Wines, &c., &c., direct from England or the Continent, he offers them his services with every confidence that his selections will give the most perfect satisfaction, whether as regarding quality, cheapness, or selection to the purchaser in the execution of these commissions, a previous remittance for their full amount, or reference to any person, will invariably be required.

Every article purchased through this Agency will be most minutely examined previous to its being packed and the same care under every circumstance, taken as if it were personally delivered additionally present and superintending. Packages of a large size will, as usual, be shipped by fast-vessels to their destined port; but those of smaller dimensions, (which may be otherwise constructed,) be sent through the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Office, Overland: thus enabling persons in most instances to receive their orders fully executed within four months from the date of the transmission of their instructions.

In transactions of a private and confidential nature a full remuneration, according to circumstances, will be expected; (those of the ordinary nature of Agency Business, the Commission will be regulated by the customary rates; and for the selection, purchase and shipment of goods, a Commission of 5 per cent. on the gross sum will be charged.)

Mr. P. Pittar has taken his passage in the Zealand, to sail on the 10th February, for Seas and, therefore, requests for the present, that all letters intended for him may be directed to his residence, No. 30, Marlborough, Calcutta; but after his departure, to the address of Mr. PARKE PITTAR, EMBROIDERER AND ORIENTAL ARTS OFFICE, LONDON, where they will meet with the most prompt attention.

THE HAIR.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL.

A VERIFIABLE PRODUCTIONS.

THE only article that produces and restores the HAIR, like the WHISKERS, MUSTACHES, AND EYEBROWS; prevents Hair from falling off or turning grey to the latest period of life; changes grey hair to its original colour—draws it from its roots, and makes it beautifully SOFT, CURLY, AND GLOSSY. In dressing HAIR, it keeps it firm in the curl, unmixed by damp weather, crowded crowns, the dandruff, or in the action of ruffs. To Children, it is invaluable, as it lays a foundation for a BEAUTIFUL HEAD OF HAIR.

ON PURCHASING. (Beware of Counterfeits!) Ask for "Rowland's Macassar Oil," and see that the words are on the envelope, with the Signature and Address, thus—

A. ROWLAND & SON, 20, Hatton Garden, London.

To ensure the genuine article, see that the words "Rowland's Macassar Oil" are engraved on the back of the envelope nearly 1,500 times containing 25/100 letters WITHOUT THIS MARK. PRICE. Price 3s. 6d. Family Bottle, (containing four small), 10s. 6d. and double the size, 21s. per bottle.

The following Testimonial is one of many thousands addressed to Messrs. Rowland & Son, 20, Hatton Garden, London.

In every civilized country throughout the world the human hair is always found to be a subject of peculiar attention. Of the numerous compounds professing to promote or reproduce the hair, few have survived—few have succeeded, while Rowland's MACASSAR OIL, with a reputation already unimpaired, is still on the increase in public estimation; which fact, together with innumerable testimonials of the personal use of the proprietors is sufficient to satisfy the most inquisitive as to its sovereign virtues so repeatedly shown, in restoring, preserving, and beautifying the human hair.

In Dresden, the following testimonial equals the effects of "ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL," on either Natural or Artificial Hair, rendering it admirably soft, that it will lie in any direction; it produces beautiful flowing curls, and, by the transcendent lustre it imparts, renders the head dress truly enchanting! It preserves the coiffure in the heated atmosphere of the ball room, and neutralizes the effects of a damp atmosphere, or violent exercise.

W. MOORE,

Deputy Post-Master.
Genl. Post Office, 25th January, 1843.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S SIMLAH PROCLAMATION has not only found favour with the leading journals in London, the Chronicles and the Globe, excepted, but is described in terms of extravagant praise. "It is a thoroughly English document, straight forward, manly, unreserved." "It is an admirably written and truly eloquent proclamation—as a state document it is one of the most concise, able and eloquent we ever read. There is not one word too much, not one comma too little." "Few state papers have so concisely enunciated such important principles, or arrested such general attention." "The proclamation is one of the most remarkable specimens of sound political good sense we have ever noticed." Yet this proclamation was, with a very few exceptions, universally condemned in India, by men of all parties, by Whigs and Tories, by those who were diametrically opposed to the occupation of Afghanistan, and by those who took it up to the demands of self preservation.

It is difficult to account for this laudatory strain, except on the supposition that the sudden announcement of the victorious close of a campaign, in which the sense of past disasters was rendered more keen by the anticipation of future embarrassments, has so dazzled the eyes, and captivated the minds of public writers as to make them inensible for the moment to the true character of the Proclamation. The disaffection which this document created through the community in India, was not occasioned in the slightest degree by any regret that the war had ceased. Here its termination was hailed with feelings approaching to ecstasy. The liberation of the prisoners diffused a sentiment of joy through the country, which had never been before experienced. If the resolution to shake off Afghanistan, which the Proclamation distinctly announced, was received with less enthusiasm in India than in England, it was only because it had long been anticipated; and because we knew, not only that Lord Ellenborough had determined to have nothing farther to do with the countries beyond the Indus, but that if Lord Auckland had continued at the head of the Government, this consummation would have been brought about at an earlier period. The Proclamation was censured because it was felt that the position of a Governor General at the head of a vast empire, composed of the most heterogeneous materials, imposed on him the necessity of abstaining from the expression of any sentiment which could be identified with political animosities. It was felt, that while every Governor General was bound to correct any errors he might discover in the measures of his predecessor, it was highly impolitic openly to condemn them in a state paper which was intended to be read by the various chiefs of the country; and thus to break up the impression of that general identity of administrative policy which has characterized our Government, amidst every mutation of rulers, and constituted in the eyes of the natives one of its firmest safeguards. That impression was for the first time interrupted by the Simlah Proclamation; and we think it would be difficult to discover any advantage in this novel course of procedure, sufficient to counterbalance its imprudence. The allusion to Sir W. Macnaghten, and his unparalleled errors, appeared in India in the light of an ungenerous reflection on the deceased Envoy, who, whatever might have been his faults, had himself fallen a victim to them. Notwithstanding this unity of opinion at home among our public writers of the present day, there is no reason to apprehend that their views of the propriety of gibbeting a previous administration, or of reflecting on the dead, will meet with any tenderness at the hands of the future historian.

Of all the opinions which have been delivered by the London Press on this celebrated Proclamation, those which we find in the Patriot appear to possess the greatest weight for their calm and discriminative character. The Editor of that paper has been invariably opposed to the policy of the war. His observations have therefore the merit of impartiality, as well as of a sound judgement, and we recommend them to the perusal of our readers."

We fear it will be found rather an unfortunate circumstance that Lord Ellenborough's Proclamation has attracted so much notoriety. Its subsequent notifications will thereby be brought more prominently under examination than they would otherwise have been. There are three Proclamations yet to be commented on; the order regarding the release of Dost Mahomed, the Somnath Gates, and the thirty tons of sweetmeats. They will give rise to much animadversion, and will assuredly be condemned by all those who have not allowed their judgements to be warped by party feelings. To such an extent however has this party spirit been allowed to influence the minds of the Conservative Journalists, that we should not be surprised to find it said, that the exhibition of Dost Mahomed at the victorious tournament of Percepore, was dictated by thoroughly English feelings; that the procession of the Somnath Gates was most eminently proper, both in a political and a religious point of view, and that the announcement of the malakhs, was perfectly consistent with the dignity of a great Government.

THE APPOINTMENT OF MOONSHIFFS.—The Herald has fallen into an error regarding the Orders issued to the Sudder Dewany Adawlat by the Deputy Governor on the nomination of Moonshiffs. He says, "an opinion seems to have been entertained of late by those who have the ear of the Governor that the selections of the Sudder were not altogether impartial. The expedient hit upon to remedy the supposed defect was to require that six names should be sent to the Governor every half year, with notes of the date of appointment and character of each officer." The requisition of the half yearly report did not, however, originate in any suspicion that the nominations of the Sudder were charged.

* After this was in type, we found there was not room for the extract. It shall appear next week.

able with partiality. If it had, the "expedient hit upon" to remedy the defect bespeaks little wisdom, for it consists simply in ordering the Court to make a half yearly report of the six best qualified Moonshiffs, instead of making the same report, on the spur of the occasion, whenever a vacancy occurred. And how the requisition of periodical reports should secure more impartiality than that of occasional reports, we cannot comprehend. The fact is, that the system of requiring a separate report for each vacancy, was found to be attended with inconvenience and delay, not only as it regarded the promotion of Moonshiffs from the second grade to the first, but also in the appointment of Sudder Amseens and Principal Sudder Amseens. The Government therefore "hit on the expedient" of remedying this defect by directing that four half yearly nomination lists of officers, one for the higher, and another for the lower grade of Principal Sudder Amseens, the third for the Sudder Amseens, and the fourth for the first class of Moonshiffs, should be submitted to the Deputy Governor by the Sudder Court. The Executive Government is thus enabled without the delay or complication of a separate reference to that Court, to fill up offices which may have become vacant.

Our contemporary has also been mystified on another point. He says "all that they,"—the Government—"have gained," that is by having half yearly reports instead of reports drawn up on each vacancy, "is the privilege of passing over as many times as they think fit, the officer whom the Court places at the head, and promoting him whom they place at the bottom of the list." But had not Government this privilege before the establishment of half yearly reports; and indeed on every occasion on which a nomination list was forwarded to it? What our contemporary intends by the following sentence, we are unable to comprehend: "The subordinate officers cannot but be discouraged, therefore, when they perceive that the recommendations of the Sudder on their behalf are disregarded, or postponed to any considerations unconnected with the public interests." If he means to insinuate that the Deputy Governor has been governed in the selection of officers by "considerations unconnected with the public service," he ought to adduce the instances in which the head of the Government has been thus forgetful of the responsibilities of his station. In the present instance this allusion is peculiarly unfortunate, for Mr. Weston, the successful candidate, stood at the top of the Sudder Court's list.

THE PRESS OF INDIA.—It was remarked some years ago by the Editor of the Herald, then under the able management of Mr. Sedgwick, that the support given to the Press of India had for many years been stationary, and that the increase to the subscription list of any particular journal, was generally occasioned by defections from its contemporaries. That remark will no longer hold good. The increased circulation of newspapers, generally, is established beyond controversy by the facts which have been disclosed by the Editors. The was a time, when a paper with a thousand subscribers was a phenomenon. At the present time, if the circulation of the Harkers equals that of some of its contemporaries—there are, for instance, in India with a circulation exceeding that amount. During the past year, the Deli Gazette has gone ahead by the assistance of four hundred additional supporters. The Bombay Times had already reached the limit of its expectations, though not perhaps of its ambition, on the Continent of India, but its home circulation has been increased to an unprecedented extent. And the encouragement afforded to journalism in India by the wiles of the public, has this year enabled the Calcutta Star, the Bombay Observer, and the Madras Advertiser to enlarge their borders, and increase their attraction.

We trace this increase of the market for our publications to three causes. First and foremost, to the liberty of the Press granted by Sir Charles Metcalfe six years ago, which has emboldened those who write for the public to take a wider range of observation, and to discuss without fear, every domestic question in which their countrymen were interested. Secondly, to the monthly beam communication established between India and England, and to the receipts by its agency of periodical intelligence from our beloved country and from the nations of Christendom, by which a new interest has been given to the movements of the civilized world, from which we were comparatively shut out by distance and uncertainty. The interest thus kindled has given additional attraction to the local journals by which this intelligence is diffused through the community. Lastly, the impulse which the journals have received within the last four years, and more especially within the last year, may be traced to the unexampled anxiety felt respecting the movement of our armies and the safety of our prisoners beyond the Indus. It is to this cause that the increased press of the Deli Gazette may be ascribed. But it is to be hoped that this impulse which has thus been imparted to the periodical press of India, will survive the temporary cause which has given rise to it, and that our Editors will be enabled, by a judicious use of the resources derived from the monthly communication with England, and by their fearless and unbiased discussion of local topics, to maintain the position they have attained. Lord Ellenborough's proclamations have latterly afforded such abundant food for remark, that we have not as yet been permitted to feel the want of that stimulus which the news from Afghanistan used to supply; but whenever we may be deprived of this source of interest, the pursuits of peace, and the improvement of the country will, it is to be hoped, furnish topics of sufficient importance to retain the patronage which this Press now enjoys.

✱ The Press of India has at length become a power of small magnitude, and its influence on the public councils of the Empire, can no longer be questioned. Many are the improvements in the public administration which are to be traced up to its perseverance. At the same time, it is difficult to estimate the negative good of which it has been the instrument, by discouraging the adoption of doubtful or injurious measures. By the important disclosures, it has contributed gradually to impart a healthy character to the minds of those who are successively taking the lead in public affairs, so the older fanatics take off the stage; and in this respect its liberty has not enjoyed, and the good use made of it, have been of incalculable benefit. It has enlightened and given a specific direction to public opinion in this country. And, with the aid of a monthly beam communication, it has now extended its influence over the journals of England and Europe, and by keeping up an interest in the progress of Indian affairs, has assisted in bringing the independent opinion of the European world to bear upon the public administration here. We have thus a fresh guarantee for good government in the East. In former times, the public authorities acted only under the eye of their own masters in Leadenhall Street; at present they are constrained to feel that they are in the presence of the civilized world, and that any attempt to govern upon arbitrary or pernicious principles would bring down upon them the scorn of Europe. At no time has the Press of India occupied a more important or more responsible position than at the beginning of the year 1843, and at no period has it exhibited greater independence of character; for it is a fact not less true than singular, that at this present moment there is not a single newspaper, out of the twenty-two which are published at the various presses in India, which is not opposed to the general policy of the Governor General, and does not openly avow an entire want of confidence in his administration. ✕

SECTION FOR UPROOTING THE PRESBYTERIAN ESTABLISHMENT.—The papers received by the last Mail are filled with information which seems to portend the approach of some great religious crisis in our native land on both sides the Tweed. The dissensions in the General Assembly which appear to threaten the very existence of Presbyterianism as an established form of religion, and the rapid strides which Puseyism is making, under the auspices of the Bishops of Oxford, Salisbury, Exeter and London, forbid us to suppose that matters can long remain in their present position. A change almost as radical and organic as that which marked the beginning of the fifteenth century, seems to be approaching; and the country, already seething, at the very source of its prosperity, by the rivalry and hostility of foreign nations, seems likely to fall a prey to internal discord on the subject of religious observances, and of sacerdotal power.

At present we confine our remarks to the perilous state in which the Presbyterian Church of Scotland is placed. From the extracts we give below, it would appear that it has long been the hope, and is at present the aim of the Episcopates to root up John Knox's Establishment and transfer all Church property in Scotland to their own body. This will probably serve to explain the reason why every measure of the State has been directed, not to conciliate Dr. Chalmers and his associates, but rather to drive them to the extremity of resigning their livings. The object has been to weaken the Kirk, so as to render it an easier prey to those who are longing for its endowments. It is expected that the accumulation of so large a body of its ablest, most pious, and most energetic ministers, as the non-intrusivists, will dispose the minority to accept the form of Episcopal polity, and thus blot out the anomaly of an unsuspicious establishment in the British Isles. The design unfolded in the letter we publish, is so startling, that we should scarcely have given credit to it if we had not met with similar disclosures in a sermon recently published at Rome by the Reverend Mr. Grey, an extract from which we have found in our papers and subjoin to this article. These concurrent testimonies leave no room to doubt that the entire eradication of the Presbyterian Establishment, and the substitution of an Episcopal polity in its stead, is the object to which the energies of the Episcopalian body are at present directed. The organization of an Episcopal College at Perth, is evidently connected with this design. The difficulties of the Scottish Kirk may therefore be considered as only before it. It has a long and arduous struggle before it; and it will require all the sturdy virtue and resolution of the Covenanters to battle the designs of its adversaries, and again to resist the imposition of Bishops by the State.

Should the Presbyterian Church fall in this struggle, it will be succeeded, to all present appearances, by the most bigotted Puseyism, if indeed Puseyism should no long continue to exist distinct from Romanism. It is well known that the Bishops and Episcopal Ministers in Scotland are, with few exceptions, enlisted under the banner of this sect, and are among its most strenuous advocates. Their hatred of Presbyterianism, and for very obvious reasons, exhibit the odium theologium in its most acute form. With all their apostolical genealogy, and their sole right to administer the sacraments, and to grant admissions into the kingdom of heaven, they are still by law no better than Dissenters in Scotland, while a body of men, whom they refuse to recognize as ministers, enjoy the alliance and the endowments of the state. While therefore the feeling of the Puseyite to the Dissenter in England, is that of contempt,—sovereign, indescribable contempt, it is true, but still only contempt—the feelings of the Puseyites across the Tweed towards those who usurp the authority which belongs by apostolical descent to them, is one of intense hatred. If it be asked what kind of religious truth the Episcopals are likely to inculcate when they have obtained the Parish Churches, and substituted the imposing ritual of the Church of England for the naked forms of Presbyterianism, the answer is lamentably furnished by the papers now received. Two instances will suffice. We find that Mr. Drummond, a "man of unblemished reputation, preaching the pure word of the Gospel," has been in the habit of holding a weekly prayer-meeting with his congregation in a room or hall which he had rented for that purpose, also a Bible Class meeting and a Missionary prayer-meeting. His diocesan, Bishop Terrot, has prohibited the meetings, and Mr. Drummond has resigned his charge. On the other hand, we find that the Bishop of Aberdeen, just before the celebration of the Lord's supper, placed not a simple cross, but a crucifix, on the 'Altar'; but his congregation refused to kneel to it, and he was obliged to remove it, with the awkward explanation that it was the gift of a friend and had been placed there only for ornament.

PROSPECTS OF PRELACY IN SCOTLAND.—The conviction is gaining ground, that the Anglican party are cherishing the hope of restoring Prelacy in Scotland. Of this the projected College at Perth is one indication; and, although, in resisting the claims of the Non-intrusivists, the present Government are only acting upon the policy of their predecessors in office, yet the manner in which they have carried themselves towards the claimants has been extremely significant, and such as bodes no good to Presbyterianism. In our last Number, we saw the view taken by the Non-intrusivists of Glasgow on this subject. The "Convention" lately sitting in Edinburgh comprises the strength of the Presbyterian clergy, and it is probable that they have evinced no disposition to restrain their enmity by means of any conciliatory compromise. The Moderate minority, who justly consider that State support and State control are inseparable, estimate that proposition, however, with the air of men who would fain shut out the word of command from Presbyterianism to Episcopacy, with an obedience as insensitive as a lump of solder.

A communication in the Free Press supports this slow. It is from "the seat of an Elder," residing in the South, who, being frequently thrown into clerical circles, is in the habit of hearing what Bishops and other ecclesiastical dignitaries have to say in the North. He gives the substance of a conversation with one Bishop whom he describes as a member of the House of Lords, and a subscriber to the Fortnightly Review.

The Right Reverend person is represented as having stated, that a measure would shortly be introduced by Government to place the Scottish Bishops on the same footing of every respect with the English; that, when certain measures (which he did not specify) were sufficiently matured, he had no doubt a very large body of the most influential classes would at once accept Episcopacy, "in addition to those already calculated upon."

That this opinion was formed on the very best information from Scotland; that the Government, by refusing to grant the wishes of the dominant party, and keeping the question unsettled, would do the utmost injury to the unity and growth of the Scotch Church, while the present majority amongst the clergy would become gradually less when they saw they must give up their incognito; that, when the more violent had become Dissenters, those that remained, having no other means of obtaining full power of the law, would be "more tractable in future"; that the principal part of the unity of the clergy, or their loyalty to the Scotch Church of England, or preferred its service, and most of them educated their sons and daughters in English schools; that, besides these, they cultivated upon all the subjects of the day, and navy, with persons who had been in the East Indies and the Colonies; that they relied mainly on the great power that would emanate from the establishment of the Fortnightly Review; that the determined opposition of the Scottish people to a similar attempt in former times, the Misuse were politically hated, while our present Union is killed; that, besides, other means would now be used, not so much calculated to alarm the vulgar; and he concluded by observing, that no thorough emancipation of the country could be effected, until a similarity of religion was established by law, even though it should be maintained for a time, as in Ireland, by the upper classes alone, until the superior intelligence and loyalty of the Scotch would induce them peacefully to adopt it. "The same sentiments," adds the writer, "in almost similar words, have been repeated to me over again by clergy of all grades, whose names I can give."

A "very sanguine clergyman connected with a certain College, who has been known to say amounts not be wanting to carry it out," that it was in contemplation to divide Scotland into dioceses, to which fitly named lecturers and catechists, natives of the country, would be appointed to catechise and distribute tracts, and hold meetings to explain the trifling difference between the standards of faith belonging to the two Churches; and, when a few families were gathered, a Church properly consecrated for their use would be obtained. He adds his own conviction, that a means of obtaining information, by a central spy system, is at work in Scotland; otherwise, men who have never been out of the south of England could not acquire such a knowledge of the private concerns and opinions of a gentry resident 800 miles from them, as was evinced; but he himself explains how this may be, when he states, that "the large number of the clergy of the schools, particularly the chief one at Westminster, and every engine designed for the spread of Presley, are filled with Anglo-Saxon Scotchmen."

We would not lay stress upon the anonymous detail of conversations with unknown parties; but the statements above given have the air of truth, and are in perfect harmony with daily occurrences.—From the Voluntary

"Of all the national forms of Protestantism, the Presbyterian Establishment in Scotland is the furthest removed from the present state of things; regarding it as more than possible, that the pressure of circumstances may, ere many years are over, lead it within the grasp of the Government, the party at present dominant in the Kirk and opposed to the State, act with consistency, we cannot but regard as probable their speedy separation from the Establishment, and the consequent loss of considerable weight in numbers, energy, and zeal. While another strong body will thus be added to the numerous Free Churches, and the influence of the Establishment is even now steadily waning, on the other hand, by many of the better and better educated classes, who seek in the bosom of the Church of England, and of whose turbulence of clerical agitation has for some years deprived them. It may be observed also, that, in the Church, at least one section of the Scottish nobility and landed gentry have been long engaged. By this two-fold section, the Establishment will be much reduced in its numbers, and weakened in its energies. The more violent Presbyterian partisans will have left it, and those who remain in possession of its endowments, though perhaps not actually penetrated with a sense of the necessity of Episcopacy, will have been taught, by their late storms and troubles, the disadvantage of Presbyterian party, and the benefits of ruling as a minority.

"Thus diminished to an extent which will render its claim to usefulness, as the National Establishment, at least very questionable, and, even by the fury of sectarian assaults, it will not be so fearful if the Kirk, in its distress, is led to entertain the idea of uniting itself with the Church, which it once employed, but which has continued, unextinguished by penury, unweakened by persecution, and unshaken by contumely, in her quiet Christian course, blessing and curing not, as is now rewarded for her meek endurance, by returning prosperity. As the majority of the title or total property are already Episcopalian, and as their numbers is increasing, it may be supposed that they would gladly see the national endowments possessed by those of their own communion. The more moderate of the Clergy, who will then be left in possession of those endowments, are likely rather to favour than oppose a union. And the prejudices of the people, who are constituted by a long and great history as Popery, are rapidly diminishing, and, in the large towns at least, will soon be extinct. . . . It may be, too, that the Church in Scotland, with a view to the accomplishment of great ends, that of securing its Catholicity over the troubled national Establishment, might consent to make some concessions of ritual and form, which did not involve any vital principle, and which might facilitate the adoption of essential ecclesiastical truth. And thus we are led to regard, as an event not very remotely future, the transfer of the endowments of the Scottish Establishment to the Scotch Church, and the happy admission, within the fold of our Catholicity, of many souls, who, and whose wives, whom we should gladly hail as brethren; while the people, no longer distracted and agitated by the assertions of spiritual tyranny and the unchristian violence of party strife, will once more be able to turn their eyes from the old and sickly to the green pastures and still waters of life."—From "Sermons in Rome during Lent," by John Edmonstone, M.A., of Magdalen College, Oxford, and Vice of Dalkeith and Sheriff.

INDIAN COAL.—Perhaps there is no subject more intimately connected with the welfare of this Presidency and of its means of internal intercourse than that of Coal, and in nothing does the indifference of Government to the improvement of steam communication on our rivers appear more evident than in the neglect of every attempt to obtain a more advantageous supply of fuel. Eight years ago the Coal consumed by the steamers was brought down the Damoodra, to a point considerably below Calcutta, and transported at a heavy expense up to Allahabad; thus doubling the expense of fuel. The same circuitous route is still in use; and although it has been demonstrated that there are beds of Coal in the vicinity of the river between Calcutta and Allahabad, which if brought into use, would save Government the expense of six hundred miles of carriage, the steamers on the Ganges in the immediate neighbourhood of these rich veins are actually obliged, on many occasions, to use wood; which will not keep up a sufficient power of steam to stem the rapid current of that river. It is true that this apathy to the best interests of the country should be broken up, and that energetic measures should be adopted to bring the mineral resources with which the Gangetic valley abounds into the service of the country.

The last number of the Calcutta Journal of Natural History contains two very interesting articles on the subject of Indian Coal. The following extract shows that nothing is wanting but a spirit of enterprise in Government to secure a regular supply of Coal from the numerous beds which lie in the vicinity of Rajmahal, and thus to give a new impulse to internal steam navigation. The Coal Committee, as it would appear, on seeing the sample of Coal obtained from that locality, decided that it was hopeless to expect any further information from that quarter till an experienced officer or practical miner should be deputed thither, but the researches which Mr. Ponter has subsequently made, show that the field would not be explored in vain.

"A subsequent intimation having been received of the arrival of another sample of coal from Dooabpore, dispatched by Mr. Ponter, consisting of 180 mounds, it was distributed by the Committee to the Mint, Coopers Foundry, and the Laboratory of the Public Dispensary, for trial. Upon which Major Forbes reported from the Mint, that this sample was inferior to the last, and that it would not keep up steam. The report from Coopers Foundry describes this sample to be of a dull brownish colour, with thin bright layers, and that it was evidently a crop or surface coal, and that twenty and a half mounds were required to do the work of ten mounds of Barrow coal. The appearance of this sample induced several of the experienced miners to declare that the persons by whom it was raised, were ignorant of the properties and appearance of coal. The Committee, however, were not disposed to be hopeless to expect any further information from this quarter, until a qualified officer, or practical miner, should be deputed to Dooabpore, for the purpose of examining the mine, and of ascertaining from suitable numerous beds of coal, no doubt there to be found, the particular one, which, from its qualities and position, would afford the best return in working. In the meantime, Mr. Ponter finding the steamers on the Ganges using wood, had a quantity of Dooabpore coal delivered in January last at Bhagpore, for their use. To his disappointment, however, the Captain would not buy his coal; not that it was bad, but that they had nothing to do with the matter, faster than they could use it. He had no other alternative but to return to the supply of that article which proper to furnish. Unable therefore to obtain any remuneration for his expenses, but at the same time anxious to have the mine examined, and to deliver it, he delivered it to the Captain of the three of the steamers, who gladly accepted it on these terms, but he did not have the opportunity, and one only of three furnished Mr. Ponter with a statement of the result of the trial; but this report was so favourable, as to leave no doubt whether it was to be used or not. The report states the sample of Dooabpore coal delivered by Mr. Ponter, to be equal in quality to Dooabpore coal, and to be of the same quality, better than the coal which they were using."

Coal, however, may now form too inconsiderable an item in public expenditure to render its supply a subject of such importance. In no other way can we secure for its unnecessary transmission from the Damoodra river (the lowest continent of the floodgates) up to Allahabad, a distance of 600 miles against the strong currents of the Ganges. If the labour and money thus fruitlessly thrown away year after year, were only to be directed for a short time to the Rajmahal and other coal districts on the upper parts of the Ganges, the result would not only be attended with much local improvement in several districts where coal is abundant, but would, after a time, lessen its expense very materially."

The second extract we give is in the words of Mr. Murchison, the President of the Geological Section of the British Association, in a letter to Dr. McClelland, and enforces the necessity of employing scientific research as well as practical experience in every attempt to develop the mineral resources of this empire.

"I have for a long time been thinking with surprise (wherever my thoughts have been turned to that region, of the apparent apathy with which the subject of internal coal has been treated since 1841, to the address of Mr. Lyell, has been treated by those who govern India. I am happy to find by your letter that more has been done than I was aware of. It is a marvellous and lamentable fact, that whilst very large sums have been spent upon inquiries into the botanical productions of Hindostan, and even the most valuable have been liberally employed (to use which, no one can rejoice more than myself) no geological has been engaged, regularly and systematically, to work out the relations of the rock masses, outstanding various mineral substances useful to man."

"No geological survey of England has been without the Geological Survey of India, and the Geological Survey of India, and the appointment of Mr. new Sir H. de la Beche, to the office of geologist of the Ordnance Survey, the English Government has at length recognised the principle. In our own country, however, the great enterprise, and spirit of the Geological Society have worked out the leading data for which foreign Governments, even the United States, are glad to contribute. It seems singular that the President of the Geological Society of London, should be invited to Russia, and should, under the auspices of the Emperor, have prepared a geological map of that region (with special reference to coal tracts) whilst in regard to British India no information whatever has been sought at our hands by your rulers, and no survey of course has been tendered. You have evidently taken the right course, which is, to bring public opinion to set upon our Indian Government, which sooner or later must submit to the necessity of employing well informed geologists under a skilful chief. The points to which you direct attention in search of coal seem to be judiciously selected, as far as I am competent to judge; and assuring you that I will at all times afford you any support in my power in prosecuting the praiseworthy, and truly national objects, &c."

(Signed) R. J. MURCHISON.

"Upon this we would merely remark, that whatever be the character of the British Government in India or other respects, the world will estimate its policy in regard to the mining resources of the opinion of Mr. Murchison. Although not yet in possession of the sentiments of Sir J. Herschel and Mr. Lyell on this subject, we were to be so before long, when we shall not withhold them from our readers."

It is somewhat singular that a Government like that of Russia, which we are accustomed to regard as so greatly behind us in civilisation, should have taken a step in reference to the coal tracts in its dominions, which the Government of India has never had the public spirit to undertake. We boast of being better able to govern this large empire than the Russian; yet one of the first results of a transfer of empire from our hands to that of Russia, would in all probability be the appointment of the ablest geologists to explore the mineral wealth of India, and to make it subservient to the improvement of the country. But, say the Government, we have patronised such researches and they have failed, after costing us a mint of money. We have actually lost 50,000 Rupees on the Tennasserim coast, by working a wrong bed. What then? Are the mineral resources of India to remain buried under ground because Government has on one or two occasions found its money squandered by incompetent individuals? This may afford a strong argument for employing men of scientific experience in these researches; but it surely affords no ground for, and relinquishing all attempts at improvement. Supposing ten times this sum, or five lakhs of Rupees, to be thus laid out in attempts for the discovery of coal in the East; and supposing it to be entirely lost to every useful purpose,—which no man will have the hardihood to assert,—yet it would be but the loss of four and twenty hours' revenue; a small sum for the Government of such an empire to risk, upon such an undertaking. If private individuals had been secured from an outlay which bore a similar proportion to their resources, by the uncertainty of the enterprise, where would have been the wonders of modern improvement? Such faint reason for heartlessness is the opprobrium of our Government, and it cannot be obliterated too soon. Now that we have peace in Asia, and the drain upon our public finances has ceased, and our pecuniary prospects begin to look bright, is it not among the first duties of Government to consider the long neglected coal beds, with which Providence has enriched this land, and to employ men of scientific acquirements, of which there is no lack in its service, to explore these mines of wealth, and turn them to public account?

THE EXAMINATION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INSTITUTE, of which we gave the Programme last week, was, if possible, more gratifying than any previous exhibition of the proficiency which its higher students have attained. The wide range of subjects embraced in their studies and the depth and solidity of their acquirements, attest the indefatigable industry of the Presbyterian Missionaries, who preside over the Institution, and afford a delightful proof of the success which has attended their labours. In one respect it affords a superior education to that which the best of the Government Institutions can impart. It is unfettered in the choice of its studies, and is thus enabled to introduce its students to those higher and more ennobling truths which are connected with our moral and eternal being, and which possess so peculiar a value in a country buried in heathen superstition and ignorance. The investigation of these subjects has a natural tendency not only to improve the heart, but also to strengthen the powers of the mind, and to impart a freedom and elasticity to the exercise of them. It is impossible that a youth who has been accustomed to weigh the principles of religious belief, to detect the errors of pantheism, and to examine the evidences on which the Sacred Scriptures claim the submission of the human mind, should not enjoy advantages over a youth from whom this large and important class of truths has been shut out. The neutrality which Government is constrained to observe in all its institutions on the subject of religion, is undoubtedly a great drawback on their usefulness; and we turn with delight to an establishment in which no such restriction is imposed, and in which the same extent of intellectual knowledge is given, and in addition to it the higher advantages of religious instruction.

But what becomes of the youths who quit the institution from year to year with their minds enriched with the most valuable acquisitions? What means exist for turning the abilities they have acquired with so much labour to the general improvement of the country? What sphere of usefulness are they expected to occupy, in which the light they have obtained may be made instrumental in dispelling the darkness of their fellow-countrymen? It is a melancholy reflection employing men of scientific experience in these researches; but it surely affords no ground for, and relinquishing all attempts at improvement. Supposing ten times this sum, or five lakhs of Rupees, to be thus laid out in attempts for the discovery of coal in the East; and supposing it to be entirely lost to every useful purpose,—which no man will have the hardihood to assert,—yet it would be but the loss of four and twenty hours' revenue; a small sum for the Government of such an empire to risk, upon such an undertaking. If private individuals had been secured from an outlay which bore a similar proportion to their resources, by the uncertainty of the enterprise, where would have been the wonders of modern improvement? Such faint reason for heartlessness is the opprobrium of our Government, and it cannot be obliterated too soon. Now that we have peace in Asia, and the drain upon our public finances has ceased, and our pecuniary prospects begin to look bright, is it not among the first duties of Government to consider the long neglected coal beds, with which Providence has enriched this land, and to employ men of scientific acquirements, of which there is no lack in its service, to explore these mines of wealth, and turn them to public account?

THE MEETING IN HONOUR OF MR. GREENLAW.—The meeting which had been convened to offer some testimonial to Mr. Greenlaw, for his persevering endeavours to establish a direct steam communication between Calcutta and London, and was prorogued on the arrival of the Mail, was again assembled on Saturday last, when it was resolved that a piece of plate should be presented to him, and that if the subscription was sufficiently large, a statue or a portrait of him should be procured to be placed in the Town Hall. Among the speeches made on the occasion, by far the most interesting and eloquent was that of Mr. George Thompson. We have been endeavouring to discover in what language we could most correctly describe its excellence; but every attempt has only given us increasing dissatisfaction; and we therefore beg the reader to peruse it for himself, and he will then find what we find it so difficult to embody in words.

We are happy to find that Mr. Greenlaw's merits have been so generally and so honourably recognized by the community. Whatever quarrel we may have had with him, arose not from any doubt of his ardent zeal in this cause, but from a conviction that, his wishes required to be "coined into action." It was because we felt that unless some active exertions could be made to bring opinions, we should never obtain the fulfilment of our wishes, that we gave our humble but hearty support to the 'Precursor.' On such an occasion as the present, when the great object has been accomplished through the instrumentality of the Oriental and Paninsular Company, and the question is to reward with some token of public approbation the individual whose name has so long been identified with this Steam communication, we will cheerfully bury in oblivion every feeling connected with past discussions, and cordially unite with those who have resolved to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Greenlaw's exertions.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24.

—The Dakhi Gazette received last evening, gives the result of the Court Martial on Captains Anderson, Boyd, Eyre and Troup. They were charged with having abandoned the English forces on the march from Cabul and sought the protection of Akbar Khan. They have been honourably acquitted, and the Commander-in-Chief has fully occurred in the acquittal.

—Mr. Donham, the Governor of the Settlements in the Straits, has come round to Calcutta in the Queen Steamer, and it is believed to be his intention to retire. The Pressing Gazette says, that Mr. Torrens, the Secretary of the Board of Customs, Salt and Opium, and Col. Monteth have been mentioned as likely to succeed him. Others have mentioned Mr. Bismell, the present Resident at Moulmein; but there does not seem any great probability that any of these appointments will take place.

—Last evening's Calcutta Gazette announces the appointment of Major Broadfoot, as Commissioner of the Tenasserim Provinces from the 1st of January. No man begrudges the reward now bestowed on Major Broadfoot, which his extraordinary diary exertions have so richly earned, but a pernicious precedent is hereby created of forcing a public officer out of a public office, upon other grounds than those of public incompetency. Mr. Bismell was refused permission to resign his post when he wished to resign, and is now compelled to relinquish it when he does not wish to do so.

—The report of the death of Col. Rich, who has been twice looked off, is contradicted.

—A serious accident occurred to Mr. W. P. Grant, the Master in Equity, the night before last. His carriage was crossing the plain, about eleven at night, and as it was dark and foggy, the coachman drove into the tank north of the Ochertory monument.

Mr. Grant and those in the carriage were saved by throwing themselves from the vehicle; the carriage was dragged out the next morning, as well as the bodies of the two horses who had perished.

—An action, the second of its kind, was tried yesterday in the Supreme Court, brought by one Native against another for crime, con. with his wife. The evidence of the plaintiff being insufficient to convict the defendant, he was acquitted.

Government, it is said, intends to introduce some change in the Preventive Service. Thirty of the present active hands will be selected and placed on the permanent establishment in an inferior grade at 80 Rupees a month.

—The other news of the day is, that Dr. Duff and Mr. George Thompson have visited the Parental Asylum—that a child of six years old belonging to an individual in the Pilot service was enquired out of the house by a Native, thrown into a drain, gagged and robbed of gold ornaments of the value of 50 Rupees; that there has been a great tiffin and fine speeches on board the Prince of Wales, and that Mr. Montague's last lecture at the Mechanic's Institute was remarkable for his excellent delivery and the choice elegance of his language.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 27.

—The Agro Utthar states, that the Agra Presidency is not to be abolished, but to remain in a state of suspended animation till next January, when it will again become the seat of Government, with the addition of the Sudler Court and Board of Revenue, which are to be transferred to it; and that it will then rival Calcutta in every respect except in being a seaport and possessing a Queen's Court. It has been for some time rumoured that Lord Ellenborough was anxious to transfer the seat of the Supreme Government to this city; but now the dissolution of our connection with Afghanistan, the necessity for any such measure has been removed; and it seems improbable that Calcutta will cease to be the capital of India.

—There is to be a strong gathering of Hindu and Rajpoot chiefs to meet Lord Ellenborough at Delhi. The Rajas of Kotah, of Jaipur Patnam, and of Bhurtpore, have already started for the city. The Governor General will be escorted, it is said, by Eight Thousand troops, and thus he enabled to meet the part of the Emperor of India on a grand scale.

—On the 4th of January, the Hon. Mr. Robertson resigned the administration of the Agra Presidency to Lord Ellenborough, and afterwards received with much grace and cordiality a deputation from the unaccustomed service.

—The accident which happened to Mr. Grant the other night, by the immersion of his carriage and horses in the Durumtolah tank is likely to be the occasion of a public benefit. The Chief Magistrate is about to apply to Government for the means of raising the tank. It is doubtful whether a similar accident to a common hackney coach would have produced the same anxiety; and it is advantageous, therefore, for a Master in Equity occasionally to run the risk of being drowned.

—The Agricultural show of vegetables yesterday morning, is said by the reporter of the Harbours to have been much superior to that of the past year. A brief notice on the subject will be found among our extracts. In the evening, the members of the Society sat down to the discussion of a substantial dinner enriched by the Prize vegetables. The event of the evening was a noble speech from Mr. George Thompson, interrupted twice by Dr. Haffsangle when the orator touched on the subject of the two millions and a half of slaves held in bondage in the frost country under the sun.

—Col. Palmer's trial has ended in his acquittal. He is said to have addressed in evidence his own journal of the privations endured by the garrison. This was said to be tantamount to instituting an invidious comparison between the sufferings of the "Illustrious garrison" and his own; but the journal written during the siege could have contained no such comparison with events of which he was ignorant. We hope Col. Palmer will give his journal to the world. From the letter of Lieut. Crawford, one of the garrisons, which has already appeared, we surmise that it will contain a narrative of active exertions, and patient endurance of sufferings of as deep interest as any journal of occurrences during that eventful period.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28.

—The honourable acquittal of Col. Palmer, for the surrender of Ghuzni is at length officially published. The Court acquits him of all and every charge preferred against him, and the Commander-in-Chief "heavily censures in the opinion of this honourable verdict." The circumstances, adds his Excellency, under which Col. Palmer surrendered Ghuzni, were such as he could neither control, alter, or alleviate. As we heard nothing of any trial of the other officers who fell into the hands of the enemy, at Ghuzni, we suppose that the acquittal of Col. Palmer is the acquittal of them all.

—At the last meeting of the Magistrates of Calcutta, a Mr. John Jenkins applied against the assessment of a piece of ground near the Durumtolah Bazar. It had been assessed at 50 Rs. a month. The assessor however discovered that it had been let for 265 Rs. a month. It was eventually assessed at 200. The reporter proceeds to state that Mr. John Jenkins then asked the Magistrates to buy the Durumtolah Bazar of him for the town, and said that if it did not yield them more than a thousand Rupees a month, he was mistaken. It is not often that we are permitted to witness such an instance of public spirit and generosity, as a man's voluntarily offering to give up, we suppose for a small sum—a concern that yielded him a clear profit of a thousand Rupees a month, in the hope of benefitting the general interests of the town.

—In consequence of the close of the 5 Per Cent. Loan, the Agra Bank has closed its six per cent. deposit, and will in future allow only five per Cent.

MONDAY, JANUARY 30.

—The arrangement which has been for some time on the tapis for the appointment of a Secretary of Finance, an Indian Chancellor of the Exchequer, has been at length completed, and the last official Gazette announces the elevation of Mr. Dorda to this new, arduous and important post. A finer selection, whether we regard the natural or acquired qualifications of the individual, could not have been made.

—The native Artillery men of the 2d Company 10th Battalion of Artillery, lately commanded by Major Abbott, have expressed an earnest desire that whenever they may be again called into active service, they may have the same guns with which they served at Delhi. The Governor General has acceded to their wishes, and further directed that the guns shall have the word "Delishah" inscribed on them, and be henceforward considered as belonging to that Company.

—Messrs. Currie and Co., the proprietors of Jack Hinton and the other popular works of Mr. Lever, have issued an address to all land pirates in the British Colonies, announcing to the News-paper proprietors in the East and elsewhere, who are in the habit of reprinting those works, that it is their intention to prosecute them for infringing the Copyright. The bill-collectors will find, as Jaykilleke News-writer Dandranayak, Esq. the Harbours justly says, that they have been cutting their own throats. These replications are the cheapest and best means of advertising these books, and for one instance in which they arrest the sale of the work, they promote it in ten.

—The last accounts from Dandiekand, published in the Agro Utthar, are any thing but satisfactory. The fugitive Rajah of Jaitpore has taken refuge with the Rajah of Tehree, who can bring 20,000 men into the field, and a well appointed artillery. It is said that our troops now in that country are not equal to the task of subduing them in their mountain and jungle fastnesses as the hot winds are approaching; but it must be evident that to allow a disaffected power of such magnitude to exist in the heart of our own territories would be the height of imprudence. The article will be found among our extracts.

—As every thing connected with the Somnath Gates possesses a particular interest, we record, on the authority of the Delhi Gazette, that three insignificant gates, the emblem of Mahomedan humiliation, are to be pompously paraded through the streets of Delhi; where the scarlet and gold trappings for the car are now in progress. Our contemporary designates it the 'scarlet abomination'.

—At the meeting held at the Town Hall on Saturday last, it was resolved to present an address to Mr. Greenlaw, the indefatigable promoter of steam communication between Calcutta and England; as well as a piece of plate with a suitable inscription, and if the funds allowed of it, to procure a statue or a portrait of him. Mr. George Thompson addressed the assembly in a speech, such as was never before heard within the walls of the Town Hall. We have not room for the whole of the proceedings, but we have given his speech entire on our contemporaries.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31.

—A charge of Forgery has been brought against the Editor of the Enlightener, and he has been held to bail to answer any Bill which might be found against him by the Grand Jury. The charge appears from the proceedings in the Supreme Court yesterday, utterly groundless. Indeed, the Chief Justice himself said that there was not enough to commit on such a charge. It appears that a Native scribe took a Bill drawn by Mr. Stoecker and accepted by Mr. Hurry, to this latter gentleman who declared it a forgery. The native went to the Police, and the Magistrate without sending for Mr. Hurry or Mr. Stoecker, issued a warrant for the apprehension of the latter. Mr. Stoecker had written Mr. Hurry's name across the bill in the presence of the native, in consequence of permission which Mr. Hurry had given him to that effect. Mr. Hurry, who subsequently paid the Bill, confessed that he might have given Mr. Stoecker leave to sign for him as acceptor.

—The accounts from Seind received through the Dandey Times, extends to the 9th of January. Major Outram, who had been summarily dismissed from his appointment in Seind, the tranquillity of which he had maintained at a time when Afghanistan was boiling with rage against us, had been permitted temporarily to rejoin the appointment, though under what arrangement, we know not. His arrival at once turned the tide of affairs. The prospects of war have vanished; and there is a certain hope that the Amers will accede to all the demands of the Government General.

The Edition of the Noticed Journal, so long in the hands of Dr. Curly, has been transferred to Mr. Grant, the eminent artist.

—The Ceylon paper states, that a Medal with representations of a Lion, an Elephant, a Mountain and a Coconut given, and an inscription splendidly executed, had been presented at a large meeting held at the Queen's House by his Excellency the Governor, in the presence of Lord Elphinstone, to Don Solomon Dias Alencar, Esq. Jaykilleke News-writer Dandranayak, Esq. Medlar of the Governor's Gate, and Medlar of the Uthupala and Gangelode Pattos of the Cina Corle, &c. &c. by the inhabitants of the two Pattos in testimony of his exemplary conduct.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

—Major Eldred Pottinger has been honourably acquitted. The Court of Enquiry has expressed a "strong conviction that throughout the whole period of the painful prosecution in which Major Pottinger was so unjustly placed, his conduct was marked by a degree of energy and manly firmness, that stamps his character as one worthy of high admiration." Beware! We wish Mr. Maldoon had told us that the Governor General had much satisfaction in directing the publication of this paragraph.

—Jly 1st proclamation dated the 19th of January, the Governor General directs the concentration at Agre of the public offices connected with the administration of the North West Provinces, and orders that the Solicitor General and the Sudder Court shall be permanently located at Agre. The only objection to this is that it is not so central as Allahabad. Still however, the extreme station to which the jurisdiction of the Western Court extends is so distant from Agre, than the limit of the Court in the Lower Provinces is from Calcutta.

—The Handsome has reached Madras speedily. She left the Sandheads on the 17th at 8 p.m. and anchored in Madras roads on the 20th at 8 p.m. performing the voyage in seventy-eight hours.

—The latest account from Assam is to the 22d of January. The Niggings are coming down, says the letter, and the troops are moving up. A Nativist letter describes them as amounting to 5 or 6000 men.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following name for the Friend of India:—

* MR. GEORGE THOMPSON'S SPEECH AT THE MEETING IN HONOUR OF C. C. HENKSLAW, ESQ. Mr. Archdeacon and Gentlemen,

I beg to thank the Committee who have arranged the business of this meeting for the honour they have done me, in appointing me to move one of the resolutions on the present interesting occasion. As a stranger, equally unconnected with his Commerce and the Government of this country, I am destitute of any title to the distinction thus conferred upon me. But, as a friend to both, and a most ardent well-wisher to the prosperity of British India, and more especially, as a large participant in the benefits which have resulted from Steam Navigation, I feel that I am not wholly destitute of title, in so far as I am personally involved for the purpose of recording, in some enduring form, the gratitude of those around me, to one who for twenty years has laboured, with a well-aimed by, to strike in the first place, and difficulties of every description afterwards, to effect those marvellous changes which we see around us. (Cheers.) I could not but be all the more intimately acquainted with the history of the anxieties and trials of the gentleman to whose public virtue and services you have met to do honour. For, Sir, in the study of men, there is nothing which I desire to know more than another, it is, what passes in the bosom of him who is the solitary originator of some great enterprise, for the honour of the world shines with coldness, leaving him for years to prosecute in loneliness and holocausts his high career. I would know, if I could, what were his feelings when the first firm step was taken; what were his early trials and agonies during the period of obstruction and opposition; what were his feelings when the first glimpse of success was visible, and what his feelings in the hour of final triumph, when the whispers of ridicule are changed into the shout of applause (loud cheers.) It may be sufficient however for me, in the presence of those who possess a knowledge of these things, to have witnessed the maturity and triumph of his labours, and to feel as I do, in common with those around me, deeply indebted for the benefits which have been derived from his extraordinary exertions.

It is not to be easily and so soon, that we have seen the general advantage of Steam Communication—on the value of the discovery, by means of which, we of Great Britain, reach the shores of distant lands, and the shores of distant places in distant (cheers.) I have myself reaped in no inconsiderable degree, perhaps I may say more than any one else here, the benefits flowing from this discovery. By the aid of Steam, I have travelled again and again, the North, the Tay, and the Clyde of romantic Scotland—the Thames, the Rhine, the Moselle, and the Harz of Germany—the Hudson, the Mohawk, the Merimack and the Delaware, of America; and more recently, the Mediterranean, the Nile, the Red Sea, and last, though not least among the achievements of Steam power, the Pombar passage in India, literally passing in a few moments, from the Gulf of Marseilles into the Bay of Bengal (cheers.) But for Steam Navigation, I should never have ventured to hope for the realization of my intense desire to tread the shores of this ancient and magnificent country. I should not have had the time, even had I possessed the courage, to leave the stately spirit of the Cape, and come hither by the now antiquated and unwholesome method of sailing on board an Indiaman. As it was, however, the consummation of my high-order wish was promised me during every stage of the journey, from the moment that I lost sight of the white cliffs of England, until I beheld the low land fertile shores of the Hooghly. Nor, was I disappointed. On board the Oriental, we skirted, in a few hours, the Bay of Biscay, celebrated in imaginary poets, for its lurid, gloomy, and terrific storms, and fatal shipwrecks—we were hurrying to our Clutch—we gazed upon the lowlands of Portugal, and the highlands of Spain—we reached the unspeakable rock of Gibraltar, where we parted Europe and Africa on each other's gate.

Land of the dark-eyed maid and dusky moor; where we walked the waters of the Clutch, Sir, where during thirty years ago, we were sailing, while the mountains on either hand, resembling giant sentinels of hostile camps—we had ample time to view the far famed lions of Malaga, and the distant dunes we were in Egypt, tracing the ruins of the city founded by the Macedonian Hero, and surveying the stupendous fragments of a fallen empire. (Cheers.) By the aid of Steam, we ascended the Nile, and stood in a few days, the everlasting Pyramids. From the deck of the Oriental, we saw the frontiers of the Holy Land, and the city of Jerusalem, at the time our eyes were so disappointed, and made a wall on either side of the Pyramid, of God's chosen people from bondage. From some vessel we saw the Pyramid lifting its head to heaven, the hoary summit of Mount Sinai, where we heard the voice of God in thunder and where we promulgated the Law which teaches us his duty to his Creator and his brother. (Cheers.) Again, we passed along the shores, famous by the exploits of the Prophet of Mecca—these sandy regions, which pour forth hosts of religious warriors, unfurling the green banner of their leader, and who with the Koran in one hand, and the sword in the other, reached France on the one side, while they traversed the Indies on the other, and descended upon this country, where the sceptre of the Mogul has now passed into the hands of the representative of our beloved Queen, and where the mild maxims of Christianity, will, I trust, take the place of the stern edicts of Mahomet. All these, and other scenes besides, too many to specify, now stand before me, and I now, to our play, now bring our imagination, and now fill us with wonder; revising our historical recollections, embodying our poetical conceptions, and quickening all our senses; thus, all these we behold in little more than a month, and at last stand in health and safety on the shores of our native land, and all this we achieve, and the clearest of exhaustion weary. (Cheers.) But, the friendly aid of steam did but desert us here. We again availed ourselves of its aid, and we were in the arms of our friends. We rounded the Cape at its very base, and, instead of circumnavigating Ceylon, we crossed the Indian Ocean, and arrived in our native land, the shores of the first British Emperor, that had ever shown the way through the Strait of Ramess, to the gulf of Bengal. (Cheers.) We visited the tomb of the great conqueror, and we were on our ship with "Silber" for the service of the East, and in sixty days we were striding our own shores, while standing upon the summit of the huge island, we saw the Pyramid lifting its head to heaven, and your own river, (cheers.) We therefore, who feel our obligations to Steam Navigation, without whose aid the privilege would have been denied to some of us, of travelling in the comfort and ease, without respect and gratitude, the name of one, who has been a pioneer in the glorious work, and may be said to have brought the ends of the earth together, by demonstrating, that time and distance may, consistently, be almost treated as a journey, one long, monotonous, and perilous, turned into one of almost incredible rapidity, of Oriental ease and security, and of the highest intellectual enjoyment to all who take the time to admire what is grand in nature, or stupendous in art, or rich in production, or who cherish any desire to look upon the wonders of the world, even in civil, in science, in learning and in religion, in the cabinet, the camp and the forum, the most extraordinary in the history of our race, (cheers.)

Steam, a common-sense, thoughtful man, who is in the cabinet, the camp and the forum, the most extraordinary in the history of our race, (cheers.) When we ask ourselves, either what Steam Navigation has done, or what it seems about to do, the answer comes from all parts of the globe, and futurity itself replies, that it will be the grand instrument of linking man to man, and nation to nation, of extending commerce, diffusing thought, promoting discovery, and linking the tribes of the earth in common interests, and intimate acquaintance.

(Cheers.) Take a recent illustration of what I will not hesitate to call, one of the purest blessings emanating from the employment of this mighty agent, for the purpose of communication between persons in distant parts of the globe, and thousands of families in England were in a state of indescribable anxiety, amounting often to agony, in consequence of the uncertainty hanging over the fate of beloved relatives, in this part of the world, in prosecuting warlike operations on the one side or the other of the spot on which we were assembled, in the presence of Providence who is the wisest and most merciful of all, to grant success to British industry and British arms in both regions, and to cause the sword to be sheathed in the prospect of a truce long expected. (Cheers.) Under these circumstances, the means of conveying the heart-gladdening tidings to England had been such only as we possessed. Twenty years ago, (cheers, loud cheers,) then, farrowed thanksgivings in public, and the gratitude of ten thousand hearts, ascending like incense to God in private—caused the publication of the Pyramid and future safety of far distant friends, there would have been two, it might have been three months of additional mental torture, (cheers.)

As we can tell the mind of the inventor, and joy diffused, in consequence of the ability, through the agency of Steam, of wading tidings to England, and the joy of our eyes could upon our throne, the spirit of the inventor, who on the exchange, the heart of the widowed wife to sing for joy, and the present in his eye to thank God from some vessel we saw the Pyramid lifting its head to heaven, the hoary summit of Mount Sinai, where we heard the voice of God in thunder and where we promulgated the Law which teaches us his duty to his Creator and his brother. We rounded the Cape at its very base, and, instead of circumnavigating Ceylon, we crossed the Indian Ocean, and arrived in our native land, the shores of the first British Emperor, that had ever shown the way through the Strait of Ramess, to the gulf of Bengal. (Cheers.) We visited the tomb of the great conqueror, and we were on our ship with "Silber" for the service of the East, and in sixty days we were striding our own shores, while standing upon the summit of the huge island, we saw the Pyramid lifting its head to heaven, and your own river, (cheers.) We therefore, who feel our obligations to Steam Navigation, without whose aid the privilege would have been denied to some of us, of travelling in the comfort and ease, without respect and gratitude, the name of one, who has been a pioneer in the glorious work, and may be said to have brought the ends of the earth together, by demonstrating, that time and distance may, consistently, be almost treated as a journey, one long, monotonous, and perilous, turned into one of almost incredible rapidity, of Oriental ease and security, and of the highest intellectual enjoyment to all who take the time to admire what is grand in nature, or stupendous in art, or rich in production, or who cherish any desire to look upon the wonders of the world, even in civil, in science, in learning and in religion, in the cabinet, the camp and the forum, the most extraordinary in the history of our race, (cheers.) When we ask ourselves, either what Steam Navigation has done, or what it seems about to do, the answer comes from all parts of the globe, and futurity itself replies, that it will be the grand instrument of linking man to man, and nation to nation, of extending commerce, diffusing thought, promoting discovery, and linking the tribes of the earth in common interests, and intimate acquaintance. (Cheers.) Take a recent illustration of what I will not hesitate to call, one of the purest blessings emanating from the employment of this mighty agent, for the purpose of communication between persons in distant parts of the globe, and thousands of families in England were in a state of indescribable anxiety, amounting often to agony, in consequence of the uncertainty hanging over the fate of beloved relatives, in this part of the world, in prosecuting warlike operations on the one side or the other of the spot on which we were assembled, in the presence of Providence who is the wisest and most merciful of all, to grant success to British industry and British arms in both regions, and to cause the sword to be sheathed in the prospect of a truce long expected. (Cheers.) Under these circumstances, the means of conveying the heart-gladdening tidings to England had been such only as we possessed. Twenty years ago, (cheers, loud cheers,) then, farrowed thanksgivings in public, and the gratitude of ten thousand hearts, ascending like incense to God in private—caused the publication of the Pyramid and future safety of far distant friends, there would have been two, it might have been three months of additional mental torture, (cheers.)

men around them—have issued in making the genius of the mighty dead available for every useful and holy purpose to the present and surviving generations. And, if I had heard of the suffering and disinterested industry of the gentleman whose claims are before me to-day—his name deserves to endure in imperishable characters, in company with those who have taken part among the benefactors of the world. It is delightful to know that in regard to this man's deserved testimonial, there can be no difference of opinion—no elements of discord. (Cheers.) That is has position in the world, and that every man, whatever be the objects he desires to see accomplished. Steam ships are the servants of the world. The steamer that enters your river, brings a pastor to a congregation, that as deep within a shepherd—a wife to the arms of her waiting husband—a man of Science to explore the riches of the country—a capitalist to increase his wealth and extend his commerce—literature for those who read—dainties for the epicure—news for the politician, instructions for the servants of the Imperial Government—when you wish to send to those you love, some token of your unfading remembrance and affection—or to visit once again the scenes of your infancy and the graves of your fathers—there lies the steamer, who in your service, will carry your message, or convey your person, and, defying the winds to do their worst, will triumphantly bear you or your token, to their destined port. (Cheers.)

Let the natives of India come forward in support of the objects of this meeting. If I am asked, why they should support it, I would say, that they will learn the benefits which they will eventually derive from Steam Communication as we varied and so vast, that I cannot trust myself to give a reply. Suffice it to say, that through this medium they will learn to know England, and England will learn to know them. Knowledge will beget intimacy—intimacy will lead to friendship—friendship will ripen into love. Have we not here, a living witness of the power of steam, to bring together and link together, the natives of the two countries. Have we not here, one who has proved the power of this almost miraculous agency to carry him over the scenes I have mentioned, and to bring him even into the presence of the Queen of our isles, and into familiar communication with the friends of our land. Have we not here, the first fruits of this improved means of communication, and are we not warranted in believing, that Devonkath Captn will not be so slow to return to the land that to return from England, with good tidings of that far country, and proofs in the enlargement of his rivers—the lifting of the steamship, or the hindoo he has received, of the benefits of travelling, even to the most remote of Government. (Cheers.) We are warranted in believing all this, and much more. In proportion then we estimate the benefits we have derived, the good we are now enjoying, and the objects we hope to see accomplished, through the Agency of Steam Communication, let our gratitude be to the man, who has done so much in the cause. Let our gratitude take a substantial form. Let our motto be, "developed words," and on the pillar that commemorates the acts of the best friends of India, and the world, let there be seen the name of—CHARLES BUCKET GREENGLASS. (Loud cheers.)—Harkness.

HORTICULTURAL EXHIBITION.

The vegetable exhibition at the Town-Hall yesterday, was very well attended. There was a large crowd of males with various products of the season, and no lack of eager customers to buy them, for we observed some of the vegetables selling off, even before the sale of the Agricultural Judges appointed for the occasion. The products of the present season as exhibited on this occasion, were generally superior to those of last year, the season having been favourable for the growth of European vegetables.

There were several very excellent specimens of celery, showing a vast difference from what we saw the last few years in the art of blanching, though still wanting in closeness of stalk. Half-a-dozen samples of that superior but rare vegetable in India, the American Broccoli, were also on display, as well as some of the best of the English Broad Beans, so seldom to be met with in the Calcutta Market. The Red Cabbage, Lettuce, and Leek were of very fine quality. A few baskets of Pot Herbs (Sage, Marjoram, Thyme, &c.) and some Transvaire Yams were likewise to be found among the collection. 11th January, 1843.

REMARKS BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

I am most fully convinced, by the evidence produced upon these five trials, that these officers, Captains Anderson, Boyd and Troop, have each and all of them full and sufficient authority to render to the protection of Mahomed Akbar Khan; and I fully concur in the honourable acquittal pronounced in each case by the Court.

It is equally borne out by the evidence, that Captains Anderson and Boyd would not have returned from Akbar's bivouac to the head quarters of the force, according to the orders sent to them to do so.

(Signed) J. NICOLLA, General, and Commander-in-Chief.

The five officers above named were taken from arrest, and directed to return to their duty.

"2d. For having, on or about the 10th of March, 1842, at Ghuznee, been taken prisoner by want of due precaution."

"3d. For having, on the same occasion, by want of due precaution, and by his authority and example, caused the European commissioned officers of the regiment to fall into the hands of the enemy, thereby leaving the regiment without a proper command, under circumstances of great danger and difficulty."

DIVISION AFTER ORDER BY MAJOR-GENERAL McCAD.

Comp Fortmager, 10th January, 1861.

The force under Major General Pollock, C. B., having been directed from the day of the capture of Major General MacCallum will not deny him the pleasure of publicly bidding farewell to the division which has been so long under his services in times as fertile in important events. To the officers commanding brigades under him his thanks are due, they shall be offered briefly but sincerely. His Majesty's salute is most respectfully acknowledged. The following pages of his country's history, and emboldened on his enduring gratitude. To offer praise to him would be redundant. It suffices to say that he was between 1842 and 1843, 1843, that which he has ever been a leader steering success by his boldness, skill, and ready zeal in executing the orders of his leaders.

Brigadier Mondak, C. B. has received already the most significant tokens of his sovereign's approbation, and during the campaign now brought to a close, he was entrusted with a separate command in one very delicate enterprise, and at the head of his brigade had, on other occasions, to perform duties before the enemy requiring no ordinary resolution and address. Every where he has been found equal and superior to all that circumstances have demanded.

The gallant conduct of Brigadier Tallich, at that time, came under the personal observation of the Major General, and he must not fail, very justly, to notice it.

If Brigadier Wild's opportunities of distinguishing himself have been less brilliant, still, it must be remembered, he was usually the one with some portion of every large force, his attention to the details of his brigade, and solicitude to supply the wants and alleviate the sufferings of his soldiers, when their ranks were fearfully thinned by disease, are worthy of all praise.

The division staff have been all that could be desired. Major Harwood, C. B. Her Majesty's 18th Regiment, Deputy Assistant Adjutant General, has been indispensable in the discharge of his arduous duties. To his previous experience in Afghan affairs and knowledge of the country and its language the Major General has been deeply indebted, and his activity in the field, and alacrity in fulfilling, and even anticipating the wishes of his superiors, have commanded his esteem and admiration; he is happy in this opportunity of bearing testimony to his services, and to his claims a further advancement in his profession.

Lieutenant Jayne, 57th Native Infantry, Deputy Assistant Adjutant General, has been in this division, been an energetic, gallant and intelligent as in the blockade of Jellalabad, or the former campaign in Afghanistan, in the course of which his name has so often been placed on honorable record.

Lieutenant Bethune, Her Majesty's 9th Regiment, as Aid-de-Camp, has merited the Major General's best thanks, and his conduct in this his first campaign, has been full of activity and promise.

Sergeant Davidson, A. B. 10th Light Cavalry, and Lieut. M. A. Her Majesty's 1st Regt. and Assistant Surgeon Harvey, Her Majesty's 9th, have respectively given complete satisfaction in the discharge of the medical duties.—Delhi Gazette.

UNREMARKED.

Our latest intelligence from Bundelkhand informs us that the force, which has lately been broken and divided, is now advancing on Thane with steady steps, such as school-boys say, when making expeditions on their march.

The Viceroy has taken refuge at Thane, and notwithstanding all Major Sleeman's threats, they will give him up at no price. The Agent is a far he few call him a traitor, but not in the State, and he is fully aware that the forces now at his disposal are insufficient for the job.

The Thanees can stay time bring into the field 20,000 fighting men, as well as a large number of well appointed artillery; true, one of our battalions on an open plain would be a match for 5,000 of these mischievous creatures, but not in the jungle, and if they are determined to oppose to us they may do so with such effect in their narrow passes, that not a man of our force would come.

If Native reports are true, it is their intention to show their teeth; they are now endeavouring to strengthen their ties of friendship with the powerful State of Berar, and we would advise Major Sleeman to be very cautious how he proceeds. He no doubt finds political war troublesome; principally from his inability—not to say, perhaps, as taking the evidence of an opponent on his own word; but should he succeed in eventually tranquillizing Bundelkhand, India will owe him much. He has ably followed out the policy of his talented predecessor, Mr. Fraser, with the conception of making over the Janat country to the degraded and insubordinate Rajah; this was done on the 1st instant, and already has the man above his unit he is to govern.

In the neighbourhood of Sangor, plundering goes on the same as ever. The Madras and other troops in chase have never been able to fall in with the plunderers, nor will they ever; the latter are so numerous as such that two large bodies might pass within a hundred yards of each other and neither be aware of the proximity of the other.

We feel disappointed that the Bundelkhand will keep such of our troops as are in Bundelkhand, on the constant move, during the approaching hot weather. It is their season for sowing; having cut and stored their crops they take down their matchlocks and swords from the wall, and go forth to plunder. And why should they not? Did not their fathers do so before them?—Agre Observer.

SCINDS.

We have intelligence of the 6th inst. from Sukraw, brought by the steamer Zoulois from Kurachee. The arrival of Major Outham in General Napier's camp, on the evening of the 4th, had entirely altered the complexion of affairs, and directed for the present all expectations of hostilities. It is stated, indeed, that the show of resistance the AHERAS seemed disposed to make was intended only to cover their hesitations as to how to their brother Prince that they yielded to our wishes only on compulsion, when our force was overwhelming, and no-doubt hopes. It is a striking illustration of the influence of superior force, honest, manly character, even amongst the most cowardly and deceitful—that the mere appearance of Major OUTHAM in the field of diplomacy should occasion a change in the traditional atmosphere of Scindian politics of such magical completeness and solidity. He became at once on his arrival the subject of all praise, and as he had been invested with sovereign authority to decree their fate, instead of holding a temporary appointment with the most indefinite and uncertain powers. General NAPIER knew that in his hands British honour and interests were safe—that he knew the "capacities" of the country with whose sovereigns we had to deal, and the over-weeningness of those rulers themselves. The AHERAS felt that they had now a diplomatist who understood them; who knew what they could concede, and who would not exact more of them than he considered reasonable; and just such is the effect of personal character, in this case—this single-headed JAMES OUTHAM—lastly in such disfavour with the Government—these are the feelings which have led to the more progress in settling matters with the AHERAS, according to our views, than General NAPIER, with an army of seven thousand men, could accomplish in a couple of months. We are without disparagement to the gallant General—diplomacy was not his vocation—he knew not the people with whom he had to deal, and he could not have known them—no more did they know or confide in him. Had it come to a fighting matter, we have no doubt whatever that he would have carried through, as bravely as well as any man. We are glad to learn, on undoubted authority, that the illness of Dr. WRIGHT, which had caused so much alarm, was of a temporary and comparatively trivial nature, and that he is now perfectly recovered and in good health.—Bombay Times, January 21.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MAGISTRATE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—I have been able no where to find a full report of the late trial in the Supreme Court, which has been so much discussed in the papers, and in which Mr. JAMES was the defendant on a charge of felony. It appears however by the comments that have been published, that the prisoner was acquitted on the ground that he was resisting an illegal arrest—i.e. that the person who tried to arrest him, and who was shot at and seriously wounded in the attempt, had been furnished by his principal with what is technically termed a "general warrant."

Mr. Cockburn, the Magistrate of Justice, must have acted in this case only as a Justice of the Peace, and under the law of England as enjoined by Regulation XV. of 1800 of our Indian Code; and committed the case through the Clerk of the Crown immediately to the Supreme Court Sessions; and it was his duty to have ascertained through the Company's solicitor (Circular Order of Soldier Nisamut Adawlat, No. 36, of 10th November, 1850,) whether the forms adopted by him were regular, the evidence probably sufficient for conviction, and the charge correctly drawn up according to the evidence, before he made his commitment. He might not have been expected of him, self to know that all general warrants are not only discontinued by English law; and that all such warrants had been pronounced by the highest legal authorities illegal and void by reason of their uncertainty, as well as palpably unjust, from transferring the grounds of suspicion and arrest from the Magistrate issuing to the subordinate officer executing the warrant; (Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 4, page 291.) but had he followed to the above mentioned Circular Order, he would have been told this, and learned to frame the several Counts of his charge accordingly.

Having allowed thus much, it must also be admitted that Mr. Justice Magistrate has no means of learning and are not required to learn even the rudiments of English law, as separately from what may be demanded from them as Magistrates under the provisions of Regulation II. of 1798; VI. of 1803, Section 10; XV. of 1806; XX. of 1821; Art. 53 of Geo. III. Cap. 135 and IV. of Geo. IV. Cap. 81 (the Mutiny Act). As Justices of the Peace, when dealing between two European British subjects, or when treating European British subjects (not in the army) for other offences than petty assaults and trespasses, and immorality offences, they are taught nothing beyond the bare necessity of taking evidence on oath, and committing the offenders with the evidence so taken to the Supreme Court Sessions in Calcutta; and felons being (fortunately) extremely rare, even for the limited number of Europeans residing in the interior, there is little or no chance of gaining experience.

I would now beg to enquire under what English law a person making an illegal arrest is to be treated with fire arms—and the party so resisting to escape with impunity? If the arrest be illegal, the party so arrested must not only be upon a representation immediately sent at large, but has as his action for damages for the false imprisonment, however temporary, which he has undergone. By the English law too a constable can, without warrant or at all arrest for removing where felony is likely to ensue—(as was I believe the case in this instance when Mr. Cockburn issued his first warrant)—and any person taking his life or danger solely wounding him in the attempt is guilty of murder; and this too in cases other than these. How and Cry, where no warrant is necessary under either English or Anglo-Indian law—and being the case, how is it that a constable for the same offence arresting upon stronger grounds, is not upon his own suspicion and authority, but is not authority of a Justice of the Peace under a warrant not known by him (the constable) to be deficient, should be altogether unprotected?

It appears to me both by law and common sense (and English law is often at variance with the attributes than Anglo-Indians), that under relation to the taking of the endangering of life an illegal arrest ordered by a competent authority and executed bonafide by an accredited Agent was a misdemeanour of a high order, and punishable accordingly as a resistance of process as well as an act of unjustifiable violence. The malicious discharging a deadly weapon at any one must offer any slight provocation—even when that provocation is not under a bonafide sense of authority—must be manslaughter. The case quoted probably breaks down from there having been a simple count of "shooting at, &c." independent of the "resistance of process with shooting." It could not the Grand Jury or the Court itself have thrown out the latter or in *vi*er charge, and left it open to the Government to prosecute to take up the former or lighter charge? Our Courts of Session.

* The issuing of general warrants, says Christie in Blackstone, was declared illegal by resolution of the House of Commons of 22d April 1760.

spotless wounds in Switzerland, in Dresden, and at other German Courts, and subsequently Ambassador to Louis XVIII. Villandell is evidently running a race here with his bid, but his principles are rather too violent for success in the present day. His character is pretty much the fountain, and he is understood to have been instrumental in the restoration of the Holy Office at Rome in 1825. MISCELLANEOUS.

SUMMARY OF THIS MONTH.—The summary of the month is the news from India. No topic more stirring than the glorious termination of the war in the East, and hardly any subject is discussed but the probable good results to Great Britain from the success which has attended our brave armies in Afghanistan and China. Political and religious parties unite in considering these events of the most momentous and advantageous character. The Philanthropist rejoices that we are at an end;—the parties that the fair fame of his own beloved land is simply vindicated from recent disasters and defeats;—the merchant and manufacturer see before them a prospect of more money coming in successful and greatly extended operations in the vast continent of Asia;—hosts of British families, having connections and relatives in India, thank God no bonded slaves that they are free, and that they are, and who have not fallen in the mountain passes, will no longer be exposed to the fierce and deadly attacks of the Afghans and the Chinese;—the benevolent rejoice at the honour which has been reflected upon it by the deeds of valour performed by a portion of its troops in India; whilst the navy is proud to feel that "Britannia still rules the waves." The Christian community hopes that from these events will proceed the dawning of civilization, and the breaking down of those barriers which still separate man from man and community from community;—while the Christian will not fail to thank Him, in whose hands is the event of the battle, for the success with which our arms have been favoured, and the prospects of peace, and of augmented facilities for the introduction of Christianity which are now opened up.

The publication of the intelligence in the morning papers, and its repetition in the evening journals, created a sensation of joy which it would be impossible to describe. The only doubt which was felt was that which often occurs after the mind, even on the receipt of very good news, is the question, "Is it so good as it seems to be?" And this natural apprehension that such might be the case, was removed by the following passage which proceeded the bulletin in the Times.

The Messenger says.—"The following intelligence, received by express (the telegraph, no doubt), has been communicated to the public by the London Standard, and is the source of the news, whether it was official or not. And then the date of 'Alexandria, Nov. 5,' shows us further about it, inasmuch as, during the progress of the war in the East between Turkey and Mahomet Ali, many wholly incorrect reports and statements of decisive battles, &c. reached England and France from the same quarter."

A second edition of the Times, and one size of the Chronicle on Tuesday morning, happily, however, put an end to all doubts on the subject; for, by an intermediate printed mail, with news from Bombay to the 15th of October, this intelligence, as well as nearly equally satisfactory news from India, arrived; and it soon became known that a TARTAR OF PEACE had indeed been concluded with the Chinese Emperor, and a commercial treaty was about being signed.

When the information reached Paris, it was stated that the British troops expelled from the French provinces. "This was a rumour got up by the French authorities to counteract the reaction here to be produced by the favourable intelligence from China. We are sorry to have to record such facts, as they are little for the good sense or for the right feeling of the French people. The telegraphic despatch giving the conditions of the Chinese peace, which was received in London, was interrupted by the nightfall on Sunday. It was sent by the French consul at Canton to the French consul at Alexandria. The mail bearing it reached Marseilles Saturday week last, at about 10 o'clock in the afternoon.

The jealousy and unreason of the local and central French authorities were the cause of the delay in relating to the fate of the British army in Afghanistan were soon, however, rendered nugatory by the arrival of the intermediate overland mail, which indeed brought intelligence which was added to the official letter to the glory of British arms, was calculated to consolidate our influence and dominion in that portion of India subject to the British.

The booming of guns and ringing of bells gave an additional zest to the good spirits which persons of all shades of opinions necessarily felt. No one could here detain without experiencing an individual's satisfaction, and, after a gratified and a personal desire had somewhat subsided, the better feeling of rejoicing at the liberation of our countrymen from aided a more lasting subject for contemplation. These were the spontaneous feelings of the people; and the press, now one or two disagreeable exceptions, joined in the national rejoicing. The adverse parties, of Tory, Whig, and Radical, were all united in the glory of the moment, and upon which side ought to be the glory of our success. This extreme party feeling at such a moment exhibits bad taste and bad policy, and is a feeling that is not to be encouraged, to the extent of such cheering intelligence, whose like has not been heard since the French were defeated at Waterloo.

Then followed the proclamation of the Governor-General, and the event of this week is most unquestionably the evacuation of Afghanistan. All others are of comparative insignificance. But, as to that subject we have elsewhere specially called the attention of our readers, we shall simply here observe, that public opinion is still greatly divided, and that men of equal integrity, patriotism, and large and general views of public affairs and of our policy in India, are as much as ever opposed to each other on this very interesting and important subject. To the French the intelligence of the evacuation is a matter of great delight, and of a painful observation and attack. Of course, we are represented, as usual, as allied and savage marauders, who, after having devastated and ruined, ravaged and plundered, and then, having been driven out, are now returning, before national Afghan vengeance shall rise to exterminate all. Of course, we are held to be the cause of all the miseries and sufferings, and for want of honour! And of course, we are told that, having enriched ourselves by a system of wholesale spoliation, we now run away from them, whither, if we really still rule the waves, we can explain to them, and smile at these diatribes, and mock such bores.

Before we dissent in this part of our journal the all-sufficient topic, let us beg that no one Indian reader permit for a single instant the thought to cross his mind that there is an individual in the country who refuses to contribute his share of praise to the universal feeling of congratulation on the evacuation of the province and the return of the British. When reading the sentences passed by the Morning Chronicle on the desire for a general thanksgiving, let him not imagine the writer intends to do more than to say that the many of the friends of the East;—when perusing the bitter recriminations of party journalists, let him believe that it is the unquenchable desire for political controversy, which is the cause of the bitter and uncharitable attacks on their ink;—let him believe this, for though they blame the policy of the late measures, that cannot lessen the will of the friends of the East, who have faithfully obeyed their orders and performed their duty, and we will wish that no man of feeling or sense could see an article in a respectable journal to make one poor man, the cause of our late countrymen, guilty by daring bravery, &c. at the cannon's mouth.—The Atlas.

TRADE.—A beneficial change in our home trade is becoming daily more observable, and the effect is widely extending itself throughout the kingdom. From Lancashire and the north of England very cheering accounts have arrived. The advance in the price of cotton is about a halfpenny per lb, with an active and increasing demand. In the several articles used in the manufacture a decided improvement has taken place, and several vessels have been taken up for China, and more will, of course, be laid upon the station. The wool market at Leeds has been revived, and the hitherto depressing minds of many of our manufacturers derived from the prospect of a bleak trade during the coming winter. At Manchester there has been a surprising change. Some manufacturers, especially of cloths suited to the Indian and Chinese market, and of which cloths there were previously no stocks, asked as much as 10 per yard advance, which was equal to from 10 to 15 per cent. Some buyers, however, who had the greatest opinion in it that it may be fairly quoted as the amount of improvement on previous rates. At Liverpool, the fall in trade which began to show itself last week, has received an immediate stimulus during the present week, and hope mingles in the feeling which now pervades the manufacturing and mercantile circles. And, indeed, the beneficial effects which the restoration of peace cannot fail to have on trade, of course, by removing suspicion and uncertainty, a most extensive field for British enterprise has been opened, and the entire Eastern world, with the exception of Japan, is now laid open to our merchants. In fact, it is impossible to estimate the bright which trade still sits in the altered circumstances of that portion and positive hemisphere.

RELIGION.—It is well known to the readers of the ATLAS that General Vandermieren, a Belgian by birth, and an officer in the service of the King of Holland in 1830 the year before last obtained permission from the King of the Belgians to visit the Holy Land, but last year engaged in a conspiracy against the government of his country. For this he was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to death. The judgment was reversed, and he was condemned to life imprisonment. King Leopold exercised his mercy, and mitigated the punishment to imprisonment for life. He has, however, been released from prison, and has returned to Belgium in connection.—Lady Vandermieren is an English woman, one of the daughters of the late Admiral General Vandermieren, and she has obtained permission to enter the prison of the Petit Carmes at ten o'clock in the morning, and to stay till five in the afternoon. It is a very unusual privilege, and she has admitted it. The General had for some days feigned sickness, which afforded a pretext for his wife to prolong her visit. On Sunday the General was in his room with his wife and his two sons, when about eight o'clock the Turkish was the three latter pass, and let them go out without suspicion. Soon afterwards, according to his duty, which he only half performed, he opened the prisoner's door, and, to be sure that the General was within, he wished him a good night. The General did not answer, but the prisoner heard some one cough. This satisfied him, he opened the door, and he was convinced himself by examination that the General was there. Our readers will, of course, understand that the person who was Madame Vandermieren, and that the General, dressed in his wife's clothes, had left the prison with his two sons. The night passed, and the escape of the General was unknown to every one in the prison. Madame Vandermieren was going to leave the jail, when the Turkish said to her, "It was not you that you have passed the night here?" "Yes," she answered. "I have obtained permission to be in the jail being ill." "On which the Turkish opened the gate for her." At three o'clock, as the General did not call for her, the officers entered his room, and found that he had escaped. The escape was immediately sent to the Attorney-General, and domiciliary visits were paid to all the houses in which it was thought probable that he might have taken refuge. The director and three keepers of the prison of the Petit Carmes have been suspended from their functions in consequence of his escape. A judicial investigation was immediately commenced, and still continues. Circulars containing a description of the fugitive have been sent in all directions. It appears that some persons were waiting for General Vandermieren at a short distance from the prison. As soon as he was seen, they proceeded to a spot where horses were ready, which the fugitive instantly mounted, and taking the road from Scheldt, he was seen to pass several times on the following day they were in a place of safety, accompanied by fugitives; they had not stopped a moment by the way. The riders were obliged to be lifted from the ground, and he was immediately left to the ground. The magistrates have received information that Madame Vandermieren and her youngest son have arrived at Aix-la-Chapelle. The son, who has been arrested since the flight of his father, is not permitted to see any one in the prison.—Atlas.

THE LATE STORM AT MADRIDA.—FUNERAL.—Oct. 31.—Since the 19th instant we have had the most stormy weather I ever witnessed. Rain, wind, thunder, and lightning: the latter were absolutely awful. How dreadful was it to realize, amidst the crash of the elements, that He who ruled over them and directed them was the same who once visited this world to suffer agonies and death for us, and who is now making intercession for his people. We know that he does not willingly afflict the children of men, yet, it has seemed to us that this storm should not be made to pass away without producing very calamitous results. On the 24th, the wind was from the north-east, and it blew away 13 poor people with their houses. On the 24th, the rain descended upon the whole of the island, in torrents rather than showers. The roads became rivers, and the houses were deluged. Many of the vineyards, houses, with their inhabitants, numbers of cattle, swine, with hundreds of pigs of wares, have been swept away. The houses were deluged with large stones, and have been scooped out to the depth of five or six feet, and rendered impassable. The watercourses through the city, and the various and destructive torrents, have been swept away 35 feet, and covered with strong walls, are now almost choked up with fragments of rocks and mud; and the result of this must be terrible if another flood comes. Many of the houses, and 200 houses are either totally destroyed or greatly injured. Such, indeed, was the violence of the storm, that the houses were blown away, and they made a clear breach in the wall of a 12 foot thick. The people were running about the streets with wads of mud. Two poor families might refuge with us, and we were then housed, if the storm was over. The 25th was, if possible, a day of still greater excitement for us. The wind changed to the north, which set the night in upon the towers, and we were found that the storm was over. The storm was over, and the people were then housed, if the storm was over. The 25th was, if possible, a day of still greater excitement for us. The wind changed to the north, which set the night in upon the towers, and we were found that the storm was over. The storm was over, and the people were then housed, if the storm was over.

THE MICHELMAN RACE.—DIODORA, ANATOLIA, JULY 26.—The diminution of the Anatolian population by the Turkish Government has been the subject of much discussion. Fockel and Brown have found villages almost entirely deserted by the inhabitants in consequence of the severity with which the recruiting for the Nizam-i Jedid has been carried out. The effect of this on the country, it would be an interesting study to seek out all the causes which contribute to the dreaded mortality which prevails in the Anatolian villages. The fact that the land is distributed to the garrison is not sufficiently good quality, and conscious natives have been seeking in Turkey in Europe during the last few years. The Turkish Government has been aware that these young soldiers, not being married like the ancient Syrians, abandon themselves to vice, and destroy their constitutions, the consequence is, the ever increasing weakness of the Turkish empire. This fact is nowhere more perceptible than in the interior of Asia Minor, where the population is rapidly being drawn to Constantinople. At present, several of the more fertile villages are to be seen in Anatolia, from which the young men have been withdrawn, and the villages are almost deserted. I have happened to meet the Chiefs of the neighbourhood, who, from the tops of their mountains regard with profound attention the progress of the Turkish Government, and are anxious that those crops of being delivered from the yoke of the Turkish Government. At Bursa and its environs the diminution of the population is less great. In the case of these villages, the Turkish Government has been aware that these young soldiers, not being married like the ancient Syrians, abandon themselves to vice, and destroy their constitutions, the consequence is, the ever increasing weakness of the Turkish empire. This fact is nowhere more perceptible than in the interior of Asia Minor, where the population is rapidly being drawn to Constantinople. CHINA.—Intelligence has been received from China viz Bombay to the 31st of December. It is gratifying to learn, that although inflammatory reports continued to be exhibited, calling upon the people to drive away the English and exhorting animosity not to assist in rebuilding the shattered trade had been tranquilly resumed. The Chinese authorities at Canton have also assured the Plenipotentiary of their perfect ability to protect all foreigners; and have agreed to infirmly the in exchange for all laws sustained during the inspection. Thus the wisdom of Sir Henry Pottinger, in refusing to send up a force to Canton for the protection of British interests, is clearly demonstrated. Had he listened to the remonstrances of the terrified merchants, the ferment among the Chinese gentry and the people would have increased, possibly to a degree beyond our control; the Governor's acts of violence would have been repeated, and the settlement of the Tariff interrupted by new and more difficult questions of a political character.

The occurrence of such an outbreak, after the Government itself had adopted pacific views, proves how incorrect was our original estimate of the state of public feeling in China. When we first entered on hostilities, it was supposed that the common people were generally anxious for a more intimate connection with us; and that it was the official functionaries who were opposed to our wishes. The proclamations which were issued on the arrival of our armament were drawn up on this supposition, and were intended to reassure the people from the interests of their Government. It was generally announced that we made war with the Government, and not with its subjects. But there is every reason to believe, that at the present moment the community at large is far more hostile to us, than are the public authorities. It is the people who manifest the strongest repugnance to any association with us, and who are anxious to take up the quarrel which their rulers have laid down. The hostile feeling at Canton may in a great measure be accounted for.

The humiliation of the English, by the confiscation of the opium and the expulsion of Capt. Elliott and the merchants, addresses afforded a theme for exultation to this proud people. The return of the English in all their might, the destruction of the forts, and the ransom of the town, must have enflamed them to madness against the authors of this disgrace. So far as the people participated in the lofty bearing of their rulers—and they seem to have done so to a degree of which we had no conception—so far must their esteem by yielding to necessity; and it is they have been exasperated, by the humiliating blow which the dragon throne had for the first time received. But the feeling of hostility manifested towards us in other parts of the empire, where there have been no visible tokens of national degradation to excite animosity, and the hundreds of petitions which are said to have poured in upon the Imperial Cabinet against the treaty and its concessions to the outside barbarians, go far to show that our previous notions regarding the empire were founded on ignorance. We now find that the Government was not after all that effete, oriental despotism, which was ready to fall to pieces on the first rude shock it might receive. We find that the people had been sufficiently amalgamated with their conquerors, in the course of two centuries, to sympathize with their feelings of triumph and dignity. We have now discovered, that under this sternest of despots, there is still ample scope for the formation and expression of public opinion, and that this public opinion has been turned with the most virulent hostility against us.

This development of national sentiment we must not overlook, in our future intercourse with this most singular people. It must be our study to soothe rather than to irritate the community. We must lay aside those feelings of national hauteur, which unfortunately accompany us to every quarter of the globe. We must consent to forget that we have humbled the celestial empire, and beaten the lord of three hundred millions into submission. We must avoid every exhibition which might render our presence galling to the people, at the ports to which we now have admission; and above all things avoid a second war with a nation whose country we may overrun, but whose spirit it appears as impossible to subdue; for if ever we attempt to hold dominion in China, it can only be by means of a Government of centry boxes.

The Plenipotentiary has opened a correspondence with the merchants relative to the new Tariff, and has allowed three articles of the treaty and some of the correspondence, to "come out" to use an expression of the flowery nation. From these documents, which have been published in the Bombay Times, we learn that His Excellency has resolved, if possible, to persuade the High Commissioners to legalize the traffic of opium by barter. It will be a bitter pill for England to swallow, and his repugnance will possibly defeat all the arguments of Sir Henry. Indeed it seems impossible to suppose that the Emperor will ever be brought to consent to a measure, which cannot fail to shake the confidence and esteem of his subjects. After the repeated denunciations of this flowing poison in all his edicts; after having declared that the war originated in his determination to preserve the empire from being inundated with this drug; after having made peace without any mention of the odious traffic in this article—to withdraw his opposition and legalize the importation of it, and thus augment the evil too-fell, when the bulk of our troops had been withdrawn, on the mere solicitation of the Plenipotentiary, must undermine the Emperor's authority throughout the empire, and ensure the contempt of his subjects. He has lost enough of which we had no conception—so far must their esteem by yielding to necessity; and it is to be feared, that the little esteem which may yet remain in their minds, would be altogether extinguished were he to concede this vital question, without the excuse of an imperative necessity.

THE ACQUITTAL OF MAJOR POTTINGER by the Court of Enquiry, appointed to investigate his conduct after he had assumed the political direction of affairs, on the death of Sir William Macartney, though it was fully anticipated, seems to have given as much satisfaction as if it had been an unexpected event. His reputation appears to be considered in the light of public property, which every one has an interest in preserving. The explanation, to which he affixed his signature at Calcutta, however inconsistent with the honour of the British character, did not shake the public confidence in the hero of Herat and Charair; because it was felt, that whenever an opportunity was afforded him of explaining the circumstances under which it was executed, his character would appear in its original lustre. That opportunity he has now enjoyed. His conduct has been subjected to the most rigid scrutiny. The gentleman who presided at his trial, Mr. George Clerk, was perhaps the person best fitted, from his thorough acquaintance with the native character, and his long connection with the native Courts, to form an accurate estimate of Major Pottinger's proceedings in the extraordinary emergency in which he was placed; and his concurrence in that sentence of acquittal, gives us the highest additional value.

The name of Pottinger is intimately associated with the great and important events, which have occurred during the last four years, in the new spheres of action into which we have been drawn, by the current of circumstances in China and Afghanistan. The Uncle has been instrumental in humbling the Tartar dynasty, and detaching a peace under the walls of Nankin. The Nephew, after having driven back the tide of Persian invasion from the walls of Herat, was called to act in a scene of difficulties, more appalling than any in which our officers have been placed in India. His conduct on that occasion has been submitted to the ordeal of a Court of Enquiry, composed of the men best qualified by their experience to judge of it, and they have pronounced that "throughout the whole period of the painful position, in which Major Pottinger was so unexpectedly placed, his conduct was marked by a degree of energy and manly firmness, that stamps his character as one worthy of high admiration." That energy and manly firmness were baffled by circumstances beyond his control. He deserved success, though it was not given to him to enjoy it. But he is equally as much entitled to those honours, which it is the privilege of this Sovereign to bestow, as if his exertions had been crowned with success. To withhold them on such an occasion as this, would be to prohibit the more circumstances of a successful termination of events, which it is too often accidental, is deserving of greater reward than the most distinguished military virtue.

THE MADRAS BANK.—The Draft of an Act for the incorporation of a Bank at Madras has length been read in Council, and unless any unforeseen circumstance should occur to delay the passing of it, the Bank will be in operation on the 1st of June next. There is however little reason to apprehend the occurrence of such obstacle. No such difficulties as those which obstructed the establishment of the Bombay Bank, in consequence of disputes regarding the disposal of the Shares,—which obstacles were erroneously attributed to the jealousy of a Calcutta clique,—are likely to arise on the present occasion. The recommendations of the Provisional Committee of the Bank have been adopted by the Legislative Council. The Shares are to be bestowed in the first instance on the original subscribers; the shares, which may lapse by the non-payment of Subscriptions by the 1st of May, will be distributed according to seniority among the subscribers in the Supplemental list, who made application for them after the prescribed amount of time had expired. The shares, which may remain unappropriated after their claims have been provided for, will be at the disposal of a General Meeting of Subscribers.

The Capital is fixed for the present at Thirty lakhs of Rupees, of which Government subscribes for one-third. The whole amount of subscription must be made good by the subscribers on the original list by the 1st of May and by those on the supplemental list on the 30th of that month.

The poverty of the Native community at Madras is lamentably exhibited in the Schedule attached to the Draft, which contains the names of the original subscribers. Of the capital of twenty-seven lakhs of Rupees, only one lakh and thirteen thousand Rupees have been subscribed by Natives. When a similar draft of an Act for the incorporation of the Bombay Bank was published, *£*100,000 of *£*100 lakhs of Rupees of the capital were subscribed by the Natives; and at the present time, one-eighth of the capital of the Bengal Bank belongs to the people of the country. The relative proportions of shares in the Chartered Banks held by the natives at the three Presidencies may be thus stated:

Calcutta,	Europeans,	2,229	Natives,	44
Bombay,	ditto,	3,657	ditto,	1,50
Madras,	ditto,	2,387	ditto,	11

of claiming his liberty by an appeal to the public tribunals. By simply declaring that no rights arising out of a state of slavery shall be enforced by the Courts, it cuts the bonds which bound in the slave, but it does not remove him from his master; and it excites no undue expectations in his bosom. It is scarcely possible to fancy any method more simple, more judicious, and more entirely unobjectionable for getting rid of this great national evil, with which India has been afflicted for twenty centuries, than that which has now been proposed; and we therefore look forward with confidence to the cheerful acquiescence of that Presidency in this act of national beneficence.

PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY IN ENGLAND.—The papers received by the last Mail from England afford unequivocal evidence of the rapid strides which Puseyism is making, and of the boldness which its advocates have been encouraged to assume. Although it is true that some of its leading principles and practices have been condemned, in very unequivocal language, by all of the Dioceses, yet it has met with the encouragement from others which could have been desired. The faint censure which the Bishops of London, Oxford, Exeter, and Salisbury have deemed it politic to pronounce on some of its distinguishing tenets, combined with the praise bestowed on the motives and the piety of the prime movers, and the concessions which have actually made, have served to advance the cause beyond the expectations of its most sanguine advocates; and to all present appearance the cause may soon expect to be triumphant in the Church of England. There is indeed so much that is flattering to human pride in the doctrines now promulgated, that the success they have met with can excite no surprise. When it is affirmed that there can be no salvation out of the Church, and no Church without a Bishop; and that the Bishop can confer on his clergy the mysterious power of administering ordinances, which are of themselves a passport to heavenly bliss; it is not wonderful that poor weak human nature is disposed to receive a creed which teaches those doctrines, with the warmest satisfaction. The doctrine of the efficacy of the Sacraments, as administered by an episcopally ordained minister, is the keystone of the whole system; and if it be taken away, the whole fabric falls to the ground, and the episcopacy resolves itself into a mere question of ecclesiastical government. Thus the system derives its strength and support from its appeal to the strongest passion of our nature, the love of power; and the marvel is, not that "fifteen hundred" ministers should have adopted these doctrines, but that so many should still be found to repudiate them. We now proceed briefly to lay before our readers the proofs we find in the papers of the progress which Tractarianism is making in England.

It can scarcely be new to the Indian public, that the Bishop of London in his late charge, in which he endeavoured to conciliate both parties, and succeeded only in satisfying the Puseyites, allowed candles to be placed on the Altar; only they were not to be lighted till night came on. But after such a concession, the night was found to come on space in the establishment. The assent, that the Charge has raised the price of the wax in London, may possibly be an exaggeration; but it is asserted on the best authority that candles are rapidly finding their way to the churches in London, and that the episcopal hour for lighting them is anticipated in more than one Church. In Shoreditch, the pious part of the congregation arose and left the church when the candles came in, and the new Oxford ceremonies begun. Last we should be suspected of depending on partial authorities, we will quote on this subject the Gazette of la France, which says, "the Bishop of London now re-establishes a vast number of Popish ceremonies, and his clergy at his call resume the surplice, light again the wax tapers on the altar, draw nigh to the offertory of this altar so long deserted, renounce the discipline of Elizabeth to resume the Catholic, &c. Puseyism is but a path that leads to us." Among our selections will be found an account of a new Church, recently erected in a rural district in Kent on the most approved Puseyite model, and we recommend it to the special attention of those who are desirous of marking the signs of the times.

The bold tone assumed by the advocates of the party among the Journalists of the day, is an indication of its growing power, which cannot be mistaken. We do not here allude to the great organ of the sect, the British Critic, which is so compromising in its condemnation of every thing connected with the "Protestant schism," as to have obtained the highest praise from Dr. Wiseman; but to the Journalists which have undertaken to coach the new doctrine into public approbation. Among these the Post and the Times are the most conspicuous; but the Post, which is by far the most consistent, is obliged occasionally to take its associates to task for its vagaries. The plan of robbing Bangor of its Bishopric to bestow it on that "capital of manufacturing wealth and sin," as the Post designates Manchester, is deprecated in no measured language by this Puseyite Journalist, and an insinuation is thrown out that it is more than their places are worth, for the Ministry to dare to carry it into execution. We would rather see Downing Street deprived of its presence, than Bangor deprived of its Bishop. If the mysterious efficacy which is affirmed to spring from episcopal ordination be any thing but an ecclesiastical fiction, no act can be more sacrilegious, more abominable in the sight of God, or more destructive of the public welfare, than to deprive a diocese of its Bishop. Of the nature of this efficacy, the Tractarians entertain the most sublime ideas. In the preface to the second edition of Mr. Froude's Remains, Dr. Newman thus describes it; "Before Jesus Christ left the world, he breathed the Holy Spirit into his apostles, giving them the power of transmitting this precious gift to others by prayer and the imposition of hands. The apostles did so transmit it to others, and in this way it has been preserved in the world to the present day.—To seek communion with Christ through any non-episcopal association, is to be regarded, not as a schism merely, but as an ATROCIOUS." The Times however is disposed to make light of this gift—"Was there any miraculous effusion of the Holy Spirit upon two such worldlings as could be named, because Pitt gave each of them, for services, the richest bishoprics in the kingdom, the progeny of one of whom is as infamously wasting the revenues of the Church in gaming, as they were shamelessly humped on him daily in numbers and in its haunts of everything which savours of the Reformation; and that is alluded to in the last clause of this paragraph, a clergyman, and a cathedral dignitary, was a defaulter at the last Epicon races to the amount of 3000 or 4000." But this is not the only instance in which the Times, while it upholds the principles of the Tractarian party, deals the heaviest blow on their pretensions. Had we room, we could give other quotations, which seem to indicate that whenever the struggle for dominion between the Church and the State commences in reality, whenever the Anglo Catholic Church puts forth its hand to grasp the temporal power which its Roman Catholic predecessor exercised with such unquenchable vigor, the ever-ready yet all-powerful Times will again be found fighting under the banners of religious freedom.

We find it stated in the most confident tone, that of the eighty Tutors at Oxford, fifty had imbibed these doctrines. The Roman Catholics look with the liveliest feelings of hope to the result of this new movement. One of the priests in the new Cathedral at Boulogne, in a recent conversation with a Protestant, stated that they had a mass and prayers every Sunday for the conversion of England, and that their prayers had been fully answered, for their cause was prospering more than they could have anticipated. He added, that Monsieur Sibthorp would never do half the good that Mr. Newman was doing. The organ of the Jesuits in France, L'Univers, thus descends on the prospect of the return of Lamher with Rome; and the Puseyite journals quote the passage without censure; though in the earlier stage of the movement, they considered Tractarianism as the firmest bulwark against Rome. "What has been accomplished in that Church, the difficulties which it has lately surmounted, and the excellent dispositions of its members, are, in the opinion of the Times, so many guarantees that England will not pause in the course which she has now commenced. It is likewise the opinion and the ardent desire of the Catholics, who rejoice at seeing a Church so long separated from the Catholic unity, adopting again doctrines and practices which prepare for her return to the universal Church."

Numerous other signs of the Times are scattered throughout the papers we have received, which, though they may appear but straws, show us clearly which way the wind blows. The atrocious infidelity in the Forest of Dean, is already well known to our readers. The criminal, of supposing himself dying, confessed to the Captain, that she had murdered six of her own infants. These statements were repeated to her sister and to a Police man, and confirmed by the discovery of the skeletons. The father of the children is implicated in these bloody deeds. When the Clergyman, who is a Protestant, was called to give evidence before the Coroner's Jury, he deposed to the bare confession, but while he admitted that other disclosures had been made to him, declined to divulge them because they had been made to him in his spiritual capacity, thus endeavouring to introduce the doctrine of auricular confession.

But we have exhausted the reader's attention, and for the present must stop. From the various facts with which the public journals are crowded, there appears no reason to doubt that a very large portion of the Established Church, that every large portion of the Established Church, has adopted the principles advocated in the Tracts for the Times; that the party increases daily in numbers and in its haunts of everything which savours of the Reformation; and that it is approximating daily more and more to the principles and practices which distinguished the Catholic party of the reign of Henry the Eighth. At the pace which matters are now moving in a very few years will obliterate all distinctions between the Roman Catholic and the Episcop-

Church in the English establishment, revive the struggle for dominion with the state which marked the middle ages—and we fear kindly by the fire of persecution. Two steps alone are wanting to unprotestantise England, and lay her glory in the dust; the revival of the Convocation, and the elevation of Dr. Pusey, or Dr. Newman to the archbishopric of Canterbury.

SUPERVISION IN THE MEDICAL SERVICE AT THE MADRAS PRESIDENCY.—The boom recently granted by the Court of Directors to the Medical Service, of a retiring Pension calculated upon length of service, was coupled with the determination to convert the office of Superintending Surgeons into a staff appointment, to which only those fitted for it by a zealous and able discharge of their professional duties should be deemed eligible. This rule has not as yet been brought into operation at this Presidency, but we learn that the Madras Government has already begun to act upon it by rejecting Dr. Knox's claim to the post of Superintending Surgeon. Great umbrage has been taken at this step, and the strongest remonstrances have been made against it. One letter which has appeared on the subject, and which is remarkable for the vigour of its language, we have transferred to our columns from a Madras contemporary.

The question is not without its difficulties. The Court might argue, and not without reason, that the construction of the Medical Service was faulty, inasmuch as it did not afford Government the same opportunities for the reward of talent, which is enjoyed in reference to the Civil and Military Services; that the rule of promotion by strict seniority had a natural tendency to repress the energies of the service, and that some modification of it was desirable as a stimulus to professional zeal. They might affirm with strict truth, that in the arrangement now proposed, they had been actuated by the purest motives, and by large views of public utility. On the other hand, it may be said that the new rule is an innovation, as the very terms of the notification indicate; that the situation, which it is now proposed to convert into staff appointments and to hold out as prizes for superior merit, have been always held to belong of right to the senior members of the service; and that this right has acquired all the strength of a prescriptive, and the sacredness of a vested right, and cannot be set aside without an act of injustice. It may be said, that those who entered the service with the understanding that they would as surely succeed in their turn to the office of Superintending Surgeon, as a Cadet was sure of attaining the post of Brigadier if he lived long enough, cannot be deprived of this prospect without serious pecuniary injury. They might reason that the post which it is now proposed to hold out as a prize for activity and zeal, requires little professional ability, and that a knowledge of the Medical Regulations would better fit a man for the performance of its duties, than the highest medical talent. But this is a secondary consideration. The gist of the matter lies in the question whether the Court of Directors have the right, as they have the power, to make such a change in the construction of the service, as shall deprive a certain number of their servants of the rewards to which they have been hitherto entitled by the rules of that service. And this question can only be decided by an appeal to the Courts of law.

From the circumstance that the rule has not been acted upon at this Presidency, it is evident, by not imperative on the local authorities; and we think it will be better kept in the breach than the observance. It is not so necessary for the purpose of stimulating professional zeal as the Court may suppose, while at the same time, any promotion of a junior over the heads of his senior would give rise to heart-burnings throughout the service, and be considered as an act of unjust persecution, instead of a recognition of merit. Its effect therefore would not be to stimulate zeal, but to encourage discontent. Government may pass over notorious incapacity in this branch, as it has done in the military branch of the service, without breaking the rule of succession, or incurring the charge of favouritism; and farther than this it is scarcely advisable to go.

DUTY ON BOOKS IN ENGLAND.—We publish a letter from an esteemed correspondent relative to the duty charged on books in England. We are now enabled to inform him that the duty on books printed in England, on the exportation of which a drawback was allowed, is of the same amount as the drawback, and that on being re-imported, they pay fifty Shillings the Hundred Weight of 112lbs. There is much confusion relative to the New Tariff; and it would seem as if it was intended that books printed in England since 1801, and exported and then re-imported should pay a duty of Five Pounds Sterling the Cwt. But we have met with no one as yet in the country who can give a decisive opinion on this subject.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

—The papers announce the death of Mr. Richard Vaughan, the Taxing officer of the Supreme Court, of apoplexy, at the age of forty-six.

—The Allatris, Capt. Clarke, of 700 tons, became a total wreck on the night of the 31st of January near Venlos Bay, Ceylon. The passengers and crew were saved, but the property was entirely lost.

—Dr. Brackenbury gave a splendid entertainment on Tuesday evening in honour of Mrs. W. W. Bird, the lady of our Deputy Governor, who embarks for England on the Prince of Wales next week. The entertainment was graced by the presence of the beauty and fashion of Calcutta, and was conducted on a scale of the utmost magnificence.

—The cattle show at the Town-Hall yesterday morning, is represented to have fallen short of expectation. There was scarcely any thing like competition. The prizes were carried away by the cattle exhibited by Dr. Hufnagle, who, as the Englishman observes, appears to be the only member of the Society who takes a deep interest in the improvement of the breed of cattle.

—Letters from Bundelkhand state, that Government have proclaimed rewards to the amount of 10,000 Rupees for the apprehension of the refractory Bundelkhand Chief; 10,000 Rupees being offered for the capture of the Rajah of Jeipoor. Whether the golden temptation is strong enough to overcome the repugnance of the Chiefs, to a betrayal of the confidence reposed in them by their fugitive brethren, remains to be seen.

—We have not been able to find room for the very interesting narrative which the Englishman has been lately publishing day after day of the events at Cabul between the out-break of the insurrection and the catastrophe in January; but the last division of the narrative, containing the most authentic account which has yet appeared of the tragic death of the Envoy, we have now given entire.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

—The Poleas, from Calcutta to Moulmein, has just been wrecked off Baragun point, in the vicinity of Amherst. She was supposed to have had a large packet for Moulmein containing the October Mail. There is no intelligence of any importance from that settlement. Private letters from Rangoon mention the death at Amersport of Mr. Stiles, who has long been one of the most active and influential merchants in the Burmese dominions.

—The Hibernia of this morning mentions two instances of the infliction of the most barbarous tortures by the native officers of the Police in the interior of the country. We are happy to find, that in both instances the crime has been brought home to the offenders, and that they have been subjected to the severest punishment.

—The Marquis of Tweeddale, says the Madras Examiner, is about to give a grand ball and supper in honour of the Madras portion of the China expedition. Tables are to be laid out for 400.

—The Rance of Shikarpore, in the Deccan, has proved refractory, withheld revenue and assembled troops. Brigadier Tamkany, with his own forces and the 50th N. I., is looking after her, and will soon bring her to reason.

—The Englishman of this morning states, on the authority of a letter from Constantinople of the 1st of December, received at Bombay, that two Regiments of Poles, who had been sent against the Circassians, joined their standard, and that the Czar, enraged at this defection, had resolved to deal with the unfortunate Poles under his yoke with a severer hand than ever.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

—A serious case came before the Police yesterday. Some Corings woman appeared and demanded wages of the Captain of La Grande Descente, who had brought them up from Bourbon. He stated that they had been left ashore on that island by some Captain, that the Police, to get rid of them, had put them on board his vessel with permission to work them for the food he gave them; that he had then fed and thus worked them, and that they were entitled to no wages. His story appearing to be the true one, the complaint was dismissed.

—At the meeting of Magistrates yesterday, the long pending question of the appointment of a municipal clerk, upon which their Worship have been debating for many months, was finally decided. Mr. O'Hanlon was left in a minority of one, and Mr. McCann, Junior, was unanimously appointed to the office.

—The Hon. Mr. Amos took his departure yesterday morning in the Earl of Harcourt. The Supreme Council is thus without a Legislative member; and it is generally understood to be the wish of Lord Ellenborough that this it should remain; but it is much to be questioned whether, while the last Charter continues in full force, any Act of the Council would be valid, without the presence of such a member. That Parliament would repeal the clause which appointed the Legal Counsellor, without a division, almost without a debate, there can be little doubt; but it may be doubted whether it would be safe to allow the validity of any enactment to be called in question, by neglecting to appoint a pro tem. successor of Mr. Amos.

—The Cato, says the Star, after all remains at Delhi. Does he mean to say that they are after all to remain at Delhi, and go no farther? If so, he may be reckoning without his host. We believe they will move forward till stopped by some order from home. No such order can yet have been received, but it is doubtless now traversing France, and the temple will not be rebuilt. It is not the worst part of this joke,—if jokes it can be called,—that the chief, who holds the land on which the renovated fane is to be erected, is himself a Mahomedan!

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 6.

—Letters from the North West state, that General Shelton's Court Martial which began on the 20th of January, terminated on the 23d or 24th.

and that the charges on which he was tried were so he could easily rebut. If he is acquitted, every Court Martial will have terminated favourably, and the whole hunt of censure for the sacrifice of an entire army, will rest on the memory of General Elphinstone.

The Delhi Gazette states, that intelligence has reached Lahore, of Akbar Khan's having hoisted the green flag, and proclaimed a religious war against the Infidels. He has sent to the Mahomedan princes of Central Asia, and invited them to attack the Sikhs of Peshawar. It is said that fifty thousand fanatics are ready to join his standard and pour down on the Punjab. It is natural that he should conceive such a project after the events of the last year, and it is even probable that the religious enthusiasm of the Afghans may induce him to another invasion of India, but out of their own mountain fastnesses, they are nothing. The only difficulty in the matter, is the part which England will be constrained to take, if it ally, the ruler of the Punjab, should require aid.

—Dost Mahomed continues to linger on the British territories. He has not crossed the Sutledge; and it is not altogether certain that his ambitious son Akbar Khan would willingly resign the sceptre into his hands.

—Mr. Henry Chamberlain has taken the usual oath and his seat as Member of Council at Madras.

—The Sunderland Dispatch states, that Mr. Trevor, the Magistrate of Banaset, has obtained subscriptions from the native landholders for the construction of a road between Banaset and Jansore to the extent of 18,000 Rs.; but as it was insufficient for the purpose, he asked the assistance of Government, which, says that Journal, has been refused.

—We question whether the local Government would find itself authorized to disburse the requisite sum without direct instructions from Lord Ellenborough. We advise the native Zamindars therefore to send up a petition to his Lordship, and to remind him of the promise he made at home, that when "peace was restored to these found ready to evade the laws, and to disgrace their national character! There can be no doubt that the sharpness of Sir Henry Pottinger's in Asia (there is also no lack of money in the treasury) to the merchants was in some measure occasioned by these disreputable practices.

he has thus saved his time and his patience, both of which he would have lost, as well as his money, if he had gone to the Police.

—Accounts have been received at length from Sir Charles Napier, who had proceeded into the "sandy desert with 350 men of H. M. 22d, mounted on Camels, against a small force which he found empty. The same letter says, that there is a report that Dost Mahomed was to come down to Sukkur, to attack Affghanistan through the Bolan Pass. A similar notice was published at Delhi, and it may possibly be true. It is now confidently affirmed that the Amers of Hyderabad have agreed to all the demands made by Lord Ellenborough. One of the Emperors Steamers, which his Lordship in his proclamation said, had been transferred to the river, has arrived at Sukkur; but it draws too much water to be useful, and will be of no advantage for the conveyance of troops.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

—Sir Hugh Gough, after having paid a visit to the river in H. M. Ship Endymion. The ships from China are coming in space and our port will soon be crowded with discharged transports.

—The Herbster states that the Superintendent of Police has been directed to examine in person, the condition of the Police in the district of Jansore, which appears to be in a very disorderly state. There will be no peace in that district, till the number of Magistrates has been increased, and the Zamindars and Planters have been compelled to discontinue their establishment of Club men.

—The News brings news from China to the last day of the year. The traffic in Opium was openly conducted in the river, without any attempt at smuggling the drug. The conduct of some of the merchants is represented as being highly disgraceful. The cargo of not fewer than six vessels have been mangled in or out, under cover of the night, without paying the usual duties or port charges. What right have we to charge the Chinese with a lax morality when Britons are made at home, that when "peace was restored to these found ready to evade the laws, and to disgrace their national character! There can be no doubt that the sharpness of Sir Henry Pottinger's in Asia (there is also no lack of money in the treasury) to the merchants was in some measure occasioned by these disreputable practices.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

LAHORE.

"We give a prominent place to the annexed items from Lahore, which may be depended upon to the best of our belief, conveying as they do the intelligence we have long since anticipated of a projected attack by Sirr Mahomed Uthbar on the possessions of Shere Singh, west of the Indus. It is the necessary result of late proceedings, and may involve us, as the most thoughtless even now have foreseen, in renewed operations on the other side of that river, for to say that we can refuse the overture of the Punjab our assistance in the emergency which will arise, is to suppose a degree of political guile in our rulers, which we should be grieved indeed to see attached to them. Shere Singh will solicit our aid, and it would be the least ingratitude to deny him assistance after the really efficient manner in which he stood by us in our late invasion of the Punjab. We are making arrangements for securing authentic intelligence in the threatened quarter, and hope they will be fully answered, even with those matters we may as well mention that the Amier Dost Mahomed is still at Loodianah, without any apparent hope of bringing his son to give up the power he has assumed with such a right hand.

An Express was received from Peshawar, stating that Sirr Mahomed Uthbar Khan had marched from Khosla to Cabul, where he had been opposed by the Kuzulbakhos, and fought with them on the 10th December, when a number of them were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners; the rest fled. Of the prisoners the greatest number were thrown into dungeons with chains on, and others blown away from guns. The consequence was that we have lately established a rule from Cabul to the Khyber, and that Shahmahad Shapoor fled from the capital. He was traced by several hundreds of the Sirr's sowars, who went to pursue him, but they returned empty-handed. The last intelligence thence represented Mahomed Uthbar Khan as being prepared to advance on Jelalabad; and the late British writers urged letters to the rulers of Baluch, Bokhara and Kandahar to the sovereigns of Herat and Persia to join him in a war of religion. The Maharajah sent immediately orders to his army to march to dispossess two trusty Mussulmans towards Cabul, to ascertain what the real intentions of the Sirr's.

Jan. 11th.—Khwaiz Mahomed Khan, son of Sultan Mahomed Khan of Peshawar, again presented himself at the durbar, and stated, that his father had received letters from Mahomed Uthbar (his nephew) to the effect that he was no longer to pay obedience to the ruler of Lahore, but like a good son of Islam, as used to renounce his allegiance and proceed to join him (Uthbar Khan) as he was about to march on Peshawar with 60,000 men, and when it was conquered, would make it over to him again. The original letter we laid before the Maharajah by Khwaiz Mahomed Khan, on which H. H. observed to Rajah Dhyani Singh that Mahomed Uthbar had at once assumed a very lofty tone, but that it would be considerably lowered when he came to encounter the armies of the Khadsa. In the evening Ameer-doo-dra was told to have a pinnae built for his Highness's recreation on the river.

Jan. 12th.—Particular instructions were sent to the Killadar of Jumrood to use vigilance, night and day, as in the fort of the Afghans, it was very possible he might be attacked.

Jan. 14th.—An Express arrived from Cabul with news to the effect that Mahomed Uthbar had written to his uncle, the late Shah, and to Sirr Khan and Poor-dil Khan, stating that the English army, before which they had fled into Persia, having returned to Hindostan, and Shahmahad Shah-ooor having demolished Cabul, he had assumed the sovereignty putting to death and imprisoning the Sirr's his enemies, and that they were now at liberty to return to Afghanistan; and also informed them of his intention to turn his arms against Peshawar and take that province from the Nizam. In the evening Hakeem Ameer-doo-dra was sent for to administer relief to His Highness's eyes in which he felt much pain.

Jan. 14th.—The durbar was this morning held in the Rang-Mahal, and the most urgent instructions sent to the ruler of Peshawar to be on his guard against the Afghans. Rajah Goolab Singh imparted his intention of returning to Jumrood, and obtained permission to do so.

Jan. 15th.—The Maharajah performed certain

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

—The result of the Opium Sale of yesterday was as satisfactory to Government as that of the previous sale. The quantity sold was 1700 chests; the sum realized Rs. 22,14,000, another dear profit of about Sixteen lakhs of Rupees to the Exchequer.

—The Namania Steamer anchored off Calcutta yesterday from China. This is the vessel which caused such consternation among the Chinese whenever she moved. They usually called her the Black smoking devil.

—The death of Mr. Vaughan, the Taxing Master of the Supreme Court, has created a vacancy. He was anxious to obtain some accurate details of the late Dewan Saïm Nâib's finances, and was informed that Moostafâ yielded a revenue of one crore of rupees, of which 50 lakhs were expended for the pay of the army, and the remainder for the treasury of the Khâlan, as annual tribute. The Maharajah told Dhyân Singh he had heard that all the landed proprietors of the Bungalow had been destroyed by the Sikhs. Udhah Khan, Duld Gosty, Jan. 28.

THE MURDER OF SIR W. MACARTHEE.

Dec. 23.—About 10 A. M., a letter was received by the Envoy from Mahmood Akbar, containing one also from Skinner, the contents of the latter being as far as I could learn as follows:—“Young Lotzoff is just mounting with the view of having a personal conference with you, and entering into a settlement of the matter proposed in his letter last night;” that of the former being of the same tenor. The Envoy immediately sent for the General, to whom I understood he had previously written, and made him acquainted with the outline of the present plot, and requested him to accompany to wait two regiments and a like number of guns for special services, one for the purpose of occupying the Hala Hills, the other proceeding to Mahmood Khan's fort, to obtain possession of the person of the Naib Akbar, who was to be brought back a prisoner into cantonments.—Note: In accordance with the above arrangements the 84th Regt. and Shah's Bch, with two guns, were armed for secret service, and kept under arms all day.

The Envoy, accompanied by Captain Lawrence, Trevor and Mackintosh, left cantonments about 11 A. M., and proceeded towards the usual place of meeting. His accustomed calm and collected manner, appeared to have left him on this occasion, and one of his left hands, which he often trembles, was unusually full of Agfahs, and that the Garrison apparently were not on the alert, or prepared for any sudden attack; I rather reluctantly replied, “It is only a piece, with every thing else, and although the General is fully aware of this important issue, you see nothing is ready.” He, at the same time, sent back one of the Agfahs, who accompanied him, saying that he ordered his countrymen to leave the place. After quitting the gateway, opposite which were standing at least 500 men, the Envoy proceeded to Sir Mackintosh, one of the men suggested to Sir William, that it would be as well for him to return and warn the troops to stand to their arms, outside the Fosse.” I did not deem it necessary to add, “and send for the remainder of my escort.” He was then told that Lieut. Lotzoff was anxious to be a witness of the interview; to which he replied, “Good,” and desired him to notify to Brigadier Shelton, that he might also accompany him, he (the Brigadier) having expressed a wish to then effect, saying that they might come with the remainder of the escort who would start immediately. On approaching the banks of the canal, more Agfahs than usual being observed about, the Envoy commenced telling his suite the name of his late night's communication, and the object of the present meeting, and warned his Military Secretary to be prepared to proceed at once to the Bala Hissar; to acquaint the King with the circumstances were taking, and that a Regiment and guns, were about to march to his assistance, in case of an attack. He then observed to his party; some of his suite then observed to him:—“Have you no fears of treachery, Sir?” to which he replied, “No, but the game that I am forced to play is doubtful, and I therefore desire you to have no confidence in the rebels fulfilling the treaty, not one article of which have they to this present moment complied with; I am also told that, disappointed and enraged as they are, I can look for nothing from the troops, and the result, should it be as I hope, will more than compensate for any risks I may run; at all events, I am sure I am a hundred times less likely to be twice over again; you know well what they have been.”

On the banks of the canal, near the usual place of conference, the Envoy was met by the Maharajah, Mahmood Akbar, Khuda Baksh Khan, Ghulam Mooyeddin, &c. &c., with the exception of one man before either Ghulam, or Sir William Udhah Khan's immediate party. That one, was the active brother of Amoen Ullah Khan; and it is remarkable as showing how blind our poor mortals are, when led on by the irresistible hand of fate, that the Envoy failed to observe him! Had he done so, he would immediately have known that he was the victim of a snare. The parties, however, interchangeably mutual salutations, the Envoy presented him with a fine Ash (which the Sikhs had before made, and which the Envoy had brought for the British Government, at the price of 3,000 Rs.) saying, “Sir, I have bought you the horse you so anxiously desired,” and he answered, “Yes, and through your kindness, I have got those beautiful pistols, Lawrence Sahib too,” (pointing to a pair in his belt), “your courage and horses too, I have also received.” After having thus exchanged their presents, the Envoy should distance, and a small hillock which was free from snow than the surrounding spots, was chosen by one of the Sikhs's servants, which, owing to the close proximity of the Sikhs, was of consequence. The horse cloths were spread, and the Envoy threw himself at full length on them, with his head towards the top of the bank, Captain Mackintosh and Trevor seated beside him, while Captain Lawrence remained standing behind him, his superior; until urged by the repeated solicitations of Dost Mohammed (Udhah) he knelt on one knee. No sooner had he done so, than he found himself pined by both arms from behind, his pistols being at the same time pulled from his belt, and his sword from his scabbard. (The turning his head to look towards the Envoy, he was horrified at observing his head where he feared formerly had been, and his hands closely grasped by the hands of Udhah Khan and Shelton, the expression of his face he describes at that moment as being most dreadful. Captain L. was hurried from the Naib Khan's side, and he was advised him, if he valued his life, to mount behind him instantly, which he, seeing resistance was hopeless, did. Hardly had he gained his seat, when a shower of blood-dripping Ghazis rained down behind all the hillocks in the neighbourhood, and, warring, until then, they had lain concealed, and screaming and roaring descended the blood of the British, calling upon Mohammed, and Khan to give up to them the Farringtons behind him, who was their lawful prey. The Khan had, however, a fatal foreboding of having his own immediate pursuers on all sides, who in moments of the crowd of fanatic savages. Capt. L. was provisionally carried to Mahmood Khan's fort, and the rest of the party were left to their own devices after he was joined by Captain Mackintosh, who had run the gauntlet in the same manner through the Ghazis, but also unhurt, save by the loss of a small quantity of blood, which he had been liberally dealt off. He had been saved through the united efforts of Ghulam Mooyeddin, a merchant named, who accompanied him.

From the moment of their arrival in the fort in which was the Naib Amoen Ullah, the cell they were put in was surrounded by three hands of Ghazis, who, in a moment, they were grossly reviled, spit on, and otherwise insulted, they continually presenting muskets which the people inside turned from them, doing also as much as they could to assuage the rage of the infuriated mob.

After a time, several of the Afghan chiefs and their sons came to see the Farringtons inside, and treated and spoke to them kindly, assuring them that they were in no danger. Naib Amoen Ullah, however, on asking our names, muttered threats of dire import, such as “W'll blow you from guns, don't talk in this way; you must spare them, they are your guests.” During this time a hand reaching with great was lifted up by some of the Ghazis, and the Envoy's alarum Captain Lawrence on entering the fort asked after him and Captain Trevor's fate, and was informed that they had been taken to the house of Amoen Ullah.

On their requisition, they gave them dinner, of which the chiefs themselves also partook, having previously in a gentlemanly manner ceased them of their watches, &c. &c. The chiefs gave them money, and then to sit down and they themselves circling round the fire, recited the praises of Mohammed Shah Khan, who, they said, was the principal cause of their misfortune. At 12 o'clock at night, they were roused from their slumbers by the Shah Ghazis, of Mahmood Udhah, who told them he had come by the Sikhs's order to conduct them to his house, and that they must accompany him immediately. Accordingly, Capt. Lawrence mounted behind Dost Mohammed Khan, and Mackintosh, behind the Shah Ghazis, and in this way they were conveyed through a considerable portion of the city, which at that time was as silent as death, and they met with no prosecution of any sort or kind. On their arrival at the Bank's house, they were taken to a bed room, where with Mahmood Udhah they sat some time, the latter in tears deplored the occurrence of the day, although he had acquainted them with the manner of the Envoy.

short period he asked them if they would not like to see Capt. Skinner, and their answering in the affirmative they were shown into another room, where they found the latter asleep, who told them (the first time they had heard) of the cruel death (two days since) of the Envoy, the residence of Sir William Macartney and Captain Trevor; after some conversation on the melancholy subject, they lay down on the floor to sleep. *Eng. THE STEAMER "VYKS" AND "HENDON."

The first named of these magnificent vessels is a steam-ship belonging to the Royal Navy; she is 107½ tons burthen—about the size of the Komraucis, but greatly above that of any other vessel belonging to the Indian Navy save the Mamoon; her engines are 340 horse-power; her paddle can be shrouns out of gear in three minutes; she is armed with two eighty-six pound 1 swivel guns. The Mamoon is the most powerful vessel, for her tonnage, which has as yet rounded the Cape; she is 114½ tons burthen, and 460 horse-power—steamers of her class being scarcely ever allowed more than one horse-power for every three tons; her engines have double cylinders 34 inches in diameter each, and of 16 feet stroke; her paddle has four engines. She has two sets of boilers, with an interval sufficient to walk in between them,—each of which is 16 feet long, and 4 feet wide, the other aft, so that they are fed with fuel from two fire-chimneys. Her paddle-boxes are on Smith's patent principle, with paddle-belts, each of which is 16 feet long, and 4 feet wide; she is armed fore-and-aft with swivel 68-pdrs, each of which weighs three tons and a quarter; she has, besides, on her side four 34-pdr. medium guns; she is usually a hundred tons larger, and is propelled by engines of 100 horse-power greater power than the Komraucis,—which, until now, has been the largest of our steamers. Shipping Times, Jan. 28.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S PROCLAMATION.

The first part of the letter of this is trifling and almost enough. It is written in the short “Barlety Star” spirit of exultation at the very pretty story of the capture of the fort. Here is the Governor General of all India [says the Star official] on his right hand you will observe Koonwer Feroz Singh, son of His Highness the Maharajah of Lahore, who is the son of Feroz Singh, the prime minister, both mounted on asper Arab horses. The troops reviewed consist of nearly thirty thousand men, with one hundred and two pieces of cannon, and a number of howitzers, 12-Gunners, for the first time, the Colours presented by the Governor General. The Europeans receive double rations, and the natives an thirty thousand acres of awards.” This is a misapprehension, and a slightly exaggerated report of the notification, and is fit for the penny newspaper without almost a word of alteration.

The intimation of the pacification of Bundelkhand is of a more grave and important character. Lord Auckland's ministers were wont to urge, that when disaffection prevailed in India, the way to deal with it was to make a demonstration on Afghaniistan! The blowing up of Candahar would probably on the present occasion have been reckoned an excellent means of tranquillizing the Bundelkhand Chiefs! Lord Chamberlain takes the old-fashioned and intelligible method of sending fourteen thousand troops to the spot,—conceiving, perhaps, that the best means of pacification, was the best means of maintaining peace, and he claimed country is to chastise the disturbance-makers—the best moral influence with barbarous plundering tribes the field-pole, the sabre, and the bayonet. Shipping Times, Jan. 28.

“SUPERVISION IN THE MEDICAL SERVICE.”

To the Editor of the Spectator.

Sir,—I am a supporter of the Bill, and it is the intention of the Government, under the sanction of the late Hon. Regulations, to superintend Mr. Knox in his promotion to the grade of Superintending Surgeon. This is, as far as only a report and I trust one never to be realized, for if supervision actually takes place the Medical Service have no other alternative left to them, than that of upholding their rights by bringing the matter to a legal decision either in the Supreme Court or Queen's Bench.

It is now upwards of 17 years since I signed a certificate binding me to report to the Hon. the Company in consideration of receiving in return certain equivalents specified in their charter (regulations) of the service, one of which was, providing indemnity to the several grades of Ser-from-Superintending Surgeon-and Member of the Medical Board.

Mr. Knox has twenty years ago entered into a similar agreement with the same parties. But mark what happens. The passing through the service for full quarter of a century, counting the hours as they passed, until the one should arrive, which would relieve him from the onerous, irksome, and degrading duties of a country, containing Medical Officer, and put him in possession of the easier more agreeable and better paid ones of Superintending Surgeon, that is, for the full term, by the Court of the Surgeons when the long service and himself no longer fit for the arduous duties of an executive Officer when the long looked for goal is not only within sight, but almost within his grasp, the Court gently interposes and with all the blandness in the world requests him to wait a moment, as the Members have a few words to exchange with him previous to his taking formal possession. We may suppose some such colloquy as the following thus takes place between the parties.

Court.—You are aware Mr. Knox that a few months ago, we conferred on you a great honor as an executive Medical Officer by granting certain greatly improved rates of retiring pensions to our old Medical Officers but claiming for ourselves the same. You only one, condition in the terms of the pension, that you in common with the other members of the service shall give up your claims to promotion by seniority in the higher grades, and having accepted of this rule, it is now our intention to set upon it by passing you over and promoting a junior over your head.

Knox.—(In the name of the Service at large) Gentlemen, you have hitherto been so sparing of your favors to the medical branch of the service, that we are always ready to receive with thankfulness even the smallest contributions in that way, and much we certainly owe to your constant loan by which we are enabled to live; but we are not willing to barter away any of our existing rights, for any consideration you can offer—give as much as you please, but take nothing from the title we already have.

And Gentlemen, remember I hold military Commissions from both your selves and his late Majesty constituting me a military Officer, with all the rights, privileges, and immunities appertaining thereto. And further remember that the terms of these commissions and our line promotion, I am precluded from serving under the orders of any junior Officer in my own case.

Consider also, when you conferred a honor similar in kind, but infinitely more valuable in its terms, on the purely military branch, you did not exempt from them the privilege of selecting from among the Major's list, those whom you might wish to raise to the rank of Lieut. Colonel, the exclusion of seniors—neither from the Captains of Regiments those whom you might wish to elevate to that of Field Officers.

Had you done so, in either of these cases and the innovation been permitted, we could not have objected, but as the matter now stands we do object. Gentlemen, we are part and parcel of the Army—and an important part too—in consequence with them are made to endure all the hardships and privations of military life, and are equally subject to the summary proceedings of martial law—we therefore are entitled to demand the same rights of our military Commissions claim whatever advantages of a general nature may be conferred on our purely military brethren. On these grounds we claim from you, our "Lionhearted Masters," the extension of the military bonus, unconditionally, to the medical branch of the service and without any such limitation as that you are now making. And if this fair and just demand is not considered, you will most deprecably forfeit in the estimation of all honest and honorable men, your right to the costly cherished title of "Lionhearted Masters." I am myself, gentlemen, I were you, that if you attempt to pass us over, (under the provisions of my commission is virtually to denote me from the service) or to deprive me of my right of promotion, by seniority, to the highest grade a right conferred on your side by your regulations, and honestly won by me by 25 years service, I proceed direct from this chamber to my legal adviser and direct him to sue you for damages, for breach of contract, in the Queen's Bench.

The alternative is now before you—accord to me my rights or be prepared to take the consequences.

Whether Mr. Editor, Mr. Knox possesses the address to address such language to the Government in Council here, is more than I can tell, but if he has not, there are not wanting men in the Service who have, and who in doing so will command the encouragement and support of all their brethren. If therefore the Colonel not himself will respectfully, but urgently suggest, for his Lordship's most serious consideration, to ponder well before taking so fearful a step.

From the moment the order is promulgated, the whole of the Indian Medical Service is placed in collision with Government, and might and right being no longer convertible terms, why beg to subscribe myself your most obedient servant.

"DEBATES."

THE RELIGIOUS HERALD.

We were this morning favored with a copy of a Prospectus of a monthly periodical, to be entitled, the Religious Herald. It is to be published in the Burmese language on the first Wednesday in every month, by the American Baptist Missionaries, and is to be printed on half a sheet, or, we suppose, to consist of 4 pages oct. The objects of the paper are defined to be "the improvement of the native character and the diffusion of light among the heathen portion of the community." Its pages will therefore "be open to the insertion of every thing which is adapted to these ends." The price of subscription is one Rupee only, per annum. Even this low rate of subscription, we fear, will not secure the paper an extensive circulation among the natives, who have not a sufficient appreciation of knowledge to pay for it. The cheapness of subscription, however, will enable those, who are willing both to buy and impart knowledge, to subscribe for several copies for the purpose of gratuitous distribution.—Alsatian Chronicle.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DETT OF BOOKS.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—In the weekly column of news in your paper of the 20th instant, I observe some remarks relative to a recent notice in the Englishman on the subject of Duty, to be paid on printed books taken to England. The observations in the Englishman were in answer to some queries of mine.

Having a small library of books to get rid of, some of them scarce and valuable, and aware by experience of the fate that awaited them at an auction sale, I resolved, if the duty were moderate, to send them home. In an Agent's letter of 1832 I found that foreign books paid duty, bound at 25 10s. and unbound at 25 per cent. while on books originally published in, and exported from England, the duty was nominal, or 5 pence per cent. you may bid a lb. or 1 or 2s. the cent.

The Agent says, that he carried home a lot of books and found no inconvenience lay out with over on other parts of his baggage. There might, however, be a difference between books as passengers' baggage and as cargo.

In 1832, the foreign booksellers of London used to charge duties for France or 20 per cent. on the retail price of imported foreign works. What the average relative value of a cert. of books may be, it would be difficult to ascertain; but the value must have been great to admit of profit with a charge of 25 duty.

I speak only of profit on retail price, which as every one knows is somewhat less than forty per cent. above the Book Trade price, at least so Babbage says.

Profits and prices are a little foreign to the question under view; but the subject, by the enactment of the Copyright Act, becomes one of vast importance to the reading community here. And now that a regular steam carriage runs up to our very doors, let the booksellers keep a bright look out and lower their prices at least 10 or 15 per cent; or else the home Agents will soon have the trade out of their hands by shoving the public the advantage of purchasing at the ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I think that in your paper of the 19th you have somewhat overrated the result likely to be attained by the Slavery Act about to be passed; and that you have fallen somewhat into the common error of thinking that all Slavery is the same,—"a bitter pill at the best,"—as Sterns calls it; and that even in this country is in some of its features analogous in more than mere name to that in the West Indies and elsewhere, and almost equally repugnant to those who are subjected to it.

The cruelties committed in the abduction and subsequent treatment of the negro slaves in plantations of our West Indian plantations, as practised but a very few years back by educated men speaking the English language and professing the Christian religion, can no more be compared with the mode of acquiring and the treatment of slaves in this country during the last half century than a Hammermith burglary to a Mofussil "Nukbari," or the labour exacted from a convict on the Coal River, Hurary Bay, to that of an Indian Parganna manning the public roads in the 34 Pargannas!

The difference between involuntary servitude performed in a man's own country, living upon the soil and food to which he has been always accustomed, and probably seeing some members at least of his family every day of his life,—and that among strangers of a different tongue, and breathing an ungenial air is wide indeed; and when to this it is added, that in the latter state acts of violence and cruelty were of hourly occurrence both from the habits of the taskmasters and from the absence of all social checks; and that in the former, masters are notoriously kind and that few instances of cruelty perpetrated by them can pass unnoticed,—the difference between slavery in the two Indies will be allowed to be still wider, and hardly fit to be called by the same generic name.

It has been well ascertained that male slaves in this country fare better in most families than out-of-door free servants; while the ill-treatment of slaves of either sex is seldom heard of,—ash would be through the medium of a gossiping village community were it the case. It is only in the killings of Nawabs and Rajahs that it could remain a secret; and there even the testimony of respectable men goes to show that it is the exception more than the rule. Are free wives and female relations imprisoned in their sensenahs by that tyrant custom now ill-treated without the possibility of gaining release? of course they are; and what is more, probably abused and more harshly than a concubine slave.

What I have just observed has reference to what we see in our own province. With respect to Central India, Sir John Malcolm bears evidence to the slavery being chiefly confined to females; to men slaves, when they are met with, being generally in the train of men of rank as confidential servants, (It was not yet in the way in Maryland and America;) and to their work, "more like adopted children than menials." Forster too, the Bombay man, speaking of the domestic customs of the people of Cambray and Gujerat, says emphatically, "no cruel taskmasters and overrears increase the hardships of bondage; they (the slaves) are all household servants, often confidential domestic friends, and are never employed in families; and to their work," "It cannot surely be said that legislation on this subject has entirely disarmed for 27 centuries years." There are no laws in force of an earlier date than those of 1793; and in these can be found no single provision in favor of slavery anything resembling that quoted by you as enacted in 1772. By a proclamation of Government, dated 23d July, 1790^o persons concerned in the traffic of exported slaves had been declared liable to a criminal prosecution; and this proclamation appears to have been embodied in Reg. 22, of 1795, Sect. 74. By Reg. 8, of 1790, the killing of a slave was declared murder, any thing in the Mohammedan law notwithstanding. Regulations 10, of 1821, and 3, of 1832, prohibit all traffic in slaves not only imported from abroad, but brought from one province of the country to another, whether the slaves so transported objected to the change or not; while a Circular Order of the Nizamut Adawlat of the 27th April, 1791, makes the transportation of slaves, with or without their consent, a heinous offence.

I do not mean for one moment to deny that some law of the spirit of the one before us should be enacted. It would be well worthy of an independent, manly, and upright Government. All I maintain is that your estimate of its value is overdrawn; that slavery in this country is much magnified by Calcutta patriots, (who don't object to the exportation of slaves,—coolies I mean, to the Mauritius,) and country members at home; (who den fy O'Connell's account of the cruel manufacture of East India muscavado by Satan &c.)—and that there is much to be said on both sides.

Bodden, under no law or regulation in force amongst us has the right to barter in slave-law essentially legal; and the civil recognition of such rights has been solely under the Mahomedan code. By the Hindoo law, slaves being attached to the land are held to serve or inamovable property; which scarcely leaves them slaves at all. Under the civil law administered according to the Koran, enslaved persons have certainly been given in our country, but I have never seen any of them considered as slaves; and persons with their families have been declared the slaves and so with the property of deo-ded holders; but no where can I learn that such decrees,—(and considering the number of slaves they have been exceedingly few,)—have been enforced by force or restraint even. Had they been so, I feel certain there would have been many a Magistrate, whether in former or present times, to have taken cognizance of the matter, and to have interpreted the strict arm of the executive law, and to have supported the slave-law. There is certainly no anomaly here; but Magistrate acts solely under the Anglo-Indian code of laws; (by Construction, No. 80,) he only consults the law officer in cases of novelty and difficulty,—which these cases could never be; and the negative measures of not making the barter of slaves amongst slave-holders in our own Province a penal offence, can neither be considered by him an expression of assent, nor of the reverse. It might as well be argued that because an assent is not punishable where the injurious principle is to prosecute, it is not a crime to prosecute. The date of the issue of the Kilmist Adawlat of the 27th March 1835, by the Magistrate is causative without examining into the effect of slavery, merely upon the assertion of a person that he is not a slave, (and if a slave the case is, I opine, the same,) to give that person redress for violent detention, leaving the opposite party to recover his rights, as he best may, through the Civil Court; and I will repeat, that there is not a Magistrate in the country who would recognize the principle of one man to coerce even, much less to maltreat, a slave as long as there was no statute to the contrary between two men of equal status of the master and another.

The abolition of slavery however is one thing, and the non-recognition of it by the legislature another. Under the new Act hun dreds of starving infants will still be cherished in humane servitude ; ture, as it should be, all social disabilities with regard to such on their arriving at an age of discretion will cease. Adults will no longer be bought and sold like household animals and cattle (though bull-dogs are exempted by law from such sale!) in liquidation of debt; and if they fly from a hard master, their restoration will not be enforced by a Court of Civil Law. So far so good: but on such being known will not the risk be probably more of giving up the children of the starving poor? And the Magistrates in future find persons less willing to bring up without reward the hundreds of deserted infants they yearly find deserted in their paths?

+ The Herkimer has also, I find, taken up the subject in the same light, but I have not seen the article.

With respect to the provisions of this particular Act I will state,—first, that no slave has ever been bought and sold in enforcing demands for ransom or revenge; secondly, that no rights in the person and services of a slave have ever (legally at all events) been enforced by a Criminal Court; and thirdly,—very very seldom, not once perhaps in 30 years in each of the Bahar and Coohistan districts, by a Civil Court; and, fourthly,—that for the most part 40 years no act of violence, however trifling, has ever been committed on a slave with the knowledge of a European Magistrate where the offence has not been regarded as a “penal” one, and treated accordingly.

It only remains for me to suggest one slight modification in the Act now drafted. I would propose, that the provisions be ordered to come into force, say three or four years hence; that all vendible slaves at this date be registered; and that all such slaves able to purchase or procure their own freedom, be enabled to have their names struck out of said register, and that the same be under their description of personal property recognised by the Civil law of the land, should be taken away from their proprietors without either warning or compensation. I would also make a provision, that the voluntary slavery of a man above age, as common in parts of the country, in satisfaction of a debt, should be personal, with sufficient checks to prevent slaves and unskilled men from purchasing their property (as all property when this date) be free from their birth.

I remain, your most obedient servant,
AN ASSISTANT MAGISTRATE.

A PRIMITIVE CHURCH.—In recent years, through the hop district of Kent, I had occasion to be some days in the vicinity of Goodhurst, a small town. One Lord's-day morn., I repaired to one of the churches, and, to my surprise, found a congregation of devotees combined with the simplicity of Christianity worship. The one I happened to select is a small, old-fashioned building, with a porch, which I just taken my seat, when a "chile drove drop, from silence was taken, with considerable ceremony, a pair of silken or plush candle-sticks, nearly a yard high, in which were placed two large tapers, and the service proceeded on each end of the communion table. Between these and opposite a pair of crosses, was arranged the sacramental plate, consisting of two large silver chalices, and a silver paten, and a pair of silver vessels, containing water. These three things had been thus formally laid out, appeared the Congregan. He entered the communion table, and, with a flourish of the staff, arrayed in his surplice and fiddle by music, he commenced the service while supplies, as doctors come upon a stage from the wings. The latter took their seats on benches placed on the wall, which made them appear as almost floating in the congregation. To place out of which they came, I was afterwards informed, is called the "maner of the church."

and without for the purpose of dressing, and keeping their supplies in. Before this time the bell had ceased, the church was crowded, and we were all waiting for the service to begin; but it was evident from the appearance of anxiety in the clergyman and boys, that there was some cause for delay existing. In this time we continued fully a quarter of an hour, when the carriage wheels, dashing the gravel, announced the ar-arrival of some considerable personage; the surpluses were all in commotion, but again we were doomed to disappointment,—it was only the family of a neighbouring gentleman, and who could, therefore, wait like the rest of us.

least, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? The words on the left are, "Verily, verily, I say unto you. Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Not one word of doing this is in italics. It is in italics, however, that the Lord's death still is come, as he has consumed. The words marked in italics are in italics, to distinguish them from the others, which are plain.

During the evening service, which began precisely at six in the afternoon of one of the longest days in July, and which concluded in broad daylight, the summary of lighting the candles on the altar was witnessed.

From a Correspondent of the Record.

THE CHURCH AND DISSIDENTS.—The measures of Church-extension and Dissent-suppression which Mr. Mackintosh has introduced into Parliament under pretence of a regard for the "Health of Towns," is beginning to attract a degree of attention proportioned to its importance. Our readers have already seen that a movement in arrest of its insidious progress was made in the city of Bristol and in the county of Huntingdon; signs having been taken in both ways for co-operating with the Metropolitan Committee formed for the purpose of opposing the hypothetical error. The subject is under discussion among the provincial Newspapers, who learn, to their surprise and dismay, that a Bill founded upon evidence confined to the Metropolis, is drawn up so as to involve all England. An able Article which we have translated from the Standard, and which we have published in our issue of the 2nd inst., has been translated from the subject is engaging the attention of that denomination; and we understand that it has been formally brought under the consideration of the Congregational Union, and that the Executive Committee which sits for the great Methodist Body in matters affecting their interests, intends to oppose the further progress of the Bill, as an intolerable invasion of vested rights, in its nature and its effect, religious freedom. In short, we are fully warranted in promising Mr. Mackintosh as warm a reception—should he have the temerity to make the re-introduction of his bold Bill—such as will send him off with some two and-thirty years ago. The Protestant Dissenters triumphed then, and why should they not triumph now? The measures proposed by the Bill were united; and they will always triumph, when they are united. All their failures have been owing to dissension. Church-men are still livid, or attempted to be livid; and why? Because the Dissenters of that class are not united in demanding their abolition. Our Wesleyan brethren, for reasons satisfactory no doubt to themselves, (though that is not the question we are alluding to in this case,) are not just now in opposition to Church-men; and, therefore, Church-men are not indignantly abolished. But, in opposing Mr. Mackintosh's Bill, Wesleyans did stand fighting side by side with every other Dissenting denomination, as they did in 1811; and that which appeared to Sidmouth in 1811, will happen to Mackintosh in 1845.

It will be said, perhaps, by the timorous Dissenter, that the Church party are stronger than ever; and that, therefore, we cannot hope to defeat them; and certainly, to make the attempt under the influence of such a notion, would not be promising. But it is a fact, that the Church party are stronger than they were at the beginning of the present century? They may be more superficial and more despotic; but let us remember who hath said, "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall," and not be unnecessarily discouraged by distasteful aims and suggestions bearing no more despatch than they may; but stronger they are not. In fine, whatever difficulties there may be in the circumstances of the two cases, in all in our power, we will do our best. Our fathers had to encounter a Government measure; the Bill with which we are concerned, affords little more than a private Member of Parliament, although certainly Bishop may be the real parent. Was the principle of Lord Sidmouth's Bill an infamous attack upon the first principles of civil and religious liberty of now; with the suggestion of being more violent in its details, and of involving a measure of national and of national convulsion too; and all at the same time exposing the nation to the risk of idle, luxurious, and even paid clergy. We have ventured to assert that the Church party are not stronger now than they were when they were charged with sin to answer to the voice of Dissenting indignation; but there is another question. Are the Dissenters weaker? If the Wesleyans, the Independents, and the Baptists, were to be considered as a united body in the days of Catechetical and Sidmouth, will Peel and Stanley venture to slight their combined determination in 1845? We trust they will not. Let them not say, "We are not," rather, they shall, and the meddling Member by Lynton will be left to get out of the net as he best may.

Of the desperate temper of the Church in relation to this question, we have many illustrations. Let us mention one. "Professor Schofield and the Clergy of Cambridge," (see give the very words of a most trustworthy and careful Correspondent,) "have resolved to demand their full fees for all interests in that town, even when they take place in Dissenting Chapels or burying-grounds. The Professor lately declined to bury a Dissenter, for whom no burial-place for some time could be found. At length, one of our chapels was made her burying-place, and he continued to receive the service. I judge, of the surprise of the survivors, at receiving from Schofield immediately a bill for every item usually found in his funeral accounts. I vouch for the truth of this statement. It would seem almost as if the bill was paid. The object of the Clergy is evident enough. They want to establish the custom. The Parish, I do not say, will not actually do this. Our Correspondent anticipates the obvious remark, that the Ecclesiastical Professor's demand was illegal, by observing that the Clergy "want to establish the custom." And, in fact, this is the object of Mr. Mackintosh's Bill; he would not merely "establish the custom," but make it law. The principle of his Bill is, to secure to every clergyman a certain payment on the death of every parishioner, whether buried by him or not. And this out of concern for the health of towns! Certainly the health of towns people ought to be cared for; but why entrust it to a class of physicians who, always practice bleeding!—Par.

PERHAPS ACTIVITY.—[The following circular is expected to have been sent to every house in the parish to which it relates. The parts in italics are similarly employed in the copy from which we print.]

CHRIST CHURCH, DORSET.

TO ALL MY PARISHIONERS OF CHRIST CHURCH, DORSET.

"To all my Parishioners of Christ Church, Dorset, I desire to show much misunderstanding of the true nature of Holy Baptism exists, especially among the poorer members of my flock, I find it my duty to explain to you this publicity."

"That Holy Baptism is the Sacrament instituted by Christ Himself, through which we are admitted to the blessings of the Gospel; His that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

"That registration is only a civil act, appointed to ascertain the numbers of the people; and, therefore, that Registration is by no means the same thing as Baptism."

"And that Registration will not do as well as Baptism."

"That you are just as much bound to bring your children to the Church to be Baptized as you are bound when you were children yourselves: if the Registrar calls, you must answer his questions about the birth, but remember that this is not Baptism, and that nothing whatever is to be said Baptism, if it is not baptism, it is in no Christian, nor is it, after all, so much as to be said Baptism."

"That it is 'certain by God's Word, that children who are baptized, dying before they commit actual sins, are undoubtedly saved; but of children who die without Christian Baptism since they are not members of Christ's Church, in which alone salvation is to be had, we cannot be certain that they have the benefit of our Saviour's death."

"That the neglect of allowing children to die without Christian Baptism is a grievous sin on the parents' part; and the parents will have to account before God's judgment-seat for depriving their little ones of the spiritual blessing of becoming members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven."

"That the Ministers of the Clergy of the Church of England, are almost daily commissioned to administer the Sacraments of the Gospel in this country; and, therefore, you are to seek Baptism for your children at the door of the Church, and at the hands of the Clergy."

"That to prevent all hindrance from poverty, I have now measures that no fee whatever shall be demanded for registering the Baptisms of children born within my district."

"That whenever, from previous neglect, children or others are growing up unbaptized, I shall be ready, upon due examination, to baptize such persons; and in all cases without any payment."

"That, as to the proper time for Baptism, it should be, at the most, within a month after the child is born; or, at the proper place, it is the church of the district where the child takes place."

"That baptisms are administered at three o'clock on Sunday afternoons, at Christ Church, New North Street, which is your parish Church, not only for this but for all the other parishes in the district."

"I, therefore, affectionately exhort all my parishioners, not only as they love their children, but as they value their own souls, not to neglect so great a blessing for their offspring, and to bring them to the blessed waters of redemption thus freely offered them without money and without price."

"I am, your faithful Pastor and Friend in Christ, W. L. L. M. B. C. M."

"In witness of Christ Church, New North Street."

"N. B.—Where two or more families reside in one house, it is requested that this Letter may be communicated from one to the other."—Par.

THE CHURCH OF DORSET.—THE CONVENTION of the ministers of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, held at Glasgow, on the 10th of Wednesday, 1844, was opened on the 11th of Wednesday.

There were present about 400 or 470 members. Of these 100 would not vote, and the resolutions were agreed to by a majority of about 275. In the evening of Thursday last, the Convention, in its proceedings being held for the necessity of union and numbers to produce any effect upon the government, most of the dissenters gave in, and 457 members remained in their adherence to the resolutions. When it is recollected that the numbers of the established church amount to nearly 1,000 exclusive of the grand assembly, a little more than a third would appear to be in favour of the resolutions of the convention.

The resolutions, however, will speak for themselves.

FIRST SERIES OF RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY THE CONVENTION OF MINISTERS ON SATURDAY, THE 10TH OF NOVEMBER, 1844, AND CONCURRED IN BY 457 MEMBERS.

1. That according to the recent, and, as it appears to this convention, unconsolidated decisions of the supreme civil courts, and the interpretation which those decisions, if allowed to stand, would give to the law, and power in the state, would put upon the civil law—the obligation to receive and admit a qualified person, imposed by the law of patronage on the presbytery of the church, is a civil obligation, and may be enforced by the ordinary compulsions of civil law; and in particular, that the rejection of a presentee in respect of the dissent of the congregation according to the fundamental principle and law of the church, is not merely an act in which the civil courts may refuse to give civil effect, but is in itself a civil wrong or offence, which may be dealt with accordingly by the civil courts.

2. That other decisions of the civil courts, and in particular the decision of the Lord Ordinary in the case of the deposition of the Free Church ministers, imply an assumption of jurisdiction in the most sacred functions of the worship and government of the church, especially in the matter of the deposition of ministers, to the effect of reducing the sentence of the civil courts in the exercise of discipline over ministers and members of the church.

3. That these claims to jurisdiction in spiritual matters, on the part of the civil courts, are based chiefly, if not altogether, upon the act of Queen Anne restoring patronage—an act from the first unjustifiable, and recently rendered more so by the fact that the church cannot consent to accommodate her ecclesiastical procedure.

4. That as the principle involved in these decisions, and particularly in the recent Auchtermuchty judgment, is that of the supremacy of the civil courts over those of the established church in the exercise of their spiritual functions; as the members of the convention do declare that no measure can in conscience be submitted to by them which does not effectively protect the church against the exercise of such jurisdiction by the civil courts in time to come, and in particular fully prevent all future encroachments of the nature specified in the preceding resolutions.

5. That in all their past proceedings, the members of this convention have been actuated, and they trust that in all their future proceedings they will continue to be actuated, by a deep conviction of the duty and evidence of the church and ecclesiastical constitution under which they live; and that one of the chief causes of their present anxiety arises out of their impression that the members of the civil courts, in the recent decision of the civil courts, especially if those shall be finally sanctioned as the law of the land, must be regarded as having thereby declared that as they are required to be so, in the exercise of the church and the consciences of her office-bearers.

SECOND SERIES OF RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY THE CONVENTION OF MINISTERS, ON TUESDAY, THE 22D OF NOVEMBER, 1844, AND CONCURRED IN BY 324 MEMBERS.

1. That while the church most solemnly protests against the invasion of her jurisdiction by the civil courts, as contained in the recent decisions of faith, and the constitution of this kingdom; and while, in particular, she is entitled, in the judgment of her brethren now assembled, to declare, as the General Assembly in the late of 1843 has declared, that the assumption by the civil courts of authority in matters spiritual, and especially in the ordination, admission, or deposition of ministers, is a direct and deliberate violation of the law of God, and in violation of the law of the church, which was made up of the act of severity and the unity of union; and that (whereas in the late of 1843 the civil courts have declared, that they ought themselves to be held so in right of their office, it is null and void of no effect; and, what-

THE ACQUITTAL OF THE GENERAL PRISONERS.
The Courts Martial held on the officers who were recently in the hands of the Afghans, have terminated in their honorable acquittal. Those who survived the calamity, are thus exonerated from the censure of having been in any measure the occasion of it, and the obliquy of that great disaster rests upon the memory either of Sir W. Macnaghten or General Elphinstone. The Courts Martial have not given us any additional information of the real cause of that disaster; though there can be little doubt that the facts elicited at Col. Shelton's trial, would shed a flood of light on the subject, and enable the public to determine upon whose shoulders the blame really rests. The general current of opinion at present points to General Elphinstone as the instrumental cause of our discomfiture, and attributes it to his inebriety or want of judgment that the insurrection was allowed to reach a height at which it became uncontrollable. But this impression is not based on that kind of evidence which the future historian will deem conclusive, and it appears to us a sacred duty on the part of the friends, and more particularly the relatives of the deceased Envoys, to collect and publish all the documents which are necessary to illustrate the question, and to vindicate his memory from obloquy. We think that if his venerable father were not sinking under the weight of years, he would have undertaken this paternal office with his accustomed energy. Is there not individual in the large circle of his relatives who will engage in this 'labour of love,' and place his relative in an advantageous position before the present age? The Insurrection at Cabul will necessarily occupy a very prominent place in the history of British India, and it is important, not less for the reputation of the individual who occupied the most responsible position during that extraordinary event, than for the interests of truth, that its true character should be known.

Of the charges brought against Col. Shelton, he was acquitted of three and found guilty of one, viz. of having made preparations for retreating without authority, during the second week of the insurrection. But the impression which he received from his superior on the occasion, was supposed to supersede the necessity of any second punishment. This charge gives us some insight into the state of circumstances at Cabul, and explains in some measure the cause of our disaster. It appears that at a very early stage of this unhappy business, the idea of retreating to Peshawar was embraced to a considerable extent, both by the officers and men, as the only alternative left for their safety. The existence of such an opinion evidently shows that the army had become dispirited, and had lost all confidence in the military capacity of the General. And to this cause it is evidently to be attributed that succession of faint and ill directed efforts, which terminated in the annihilation of the troops.

The insurrection of Cabul differs little from the riots of London, Bristol and of other places, except in its fatal conclusion; and this is to be ascribed to the want of energy at the commencement, and to the absence of that unanimity of counsel and effort which, in such an emergency, was of the last importance. That there was a combination on the part of the chiefs to throw off the yoke and destroy the army, is incontrovertible; but a vigorous display at the commencement would, in all probability, have put it down, and at all events have enabled us to large and well equipped an army to hold its ground during the winter. The successful resistance offered to the Eastern Ghilzies by Sir Robert Sale in his progress through the Khoord Cabul pass, staggered the minds of the conspirators, and made them doubtful of the issue of the enterprise. The opposition he encountered, was evidently connected with the subsequent insurrection; and if the same bold front had been exhibited during the first two or three days of the outbreak at Cabul, it is highly probable that the whole plan would have been discovered. But the enemy was not awfully under-rated; and days were lost when every moment was of value.

The conspirators were emboldened by our inactivity, and gathered strength both in nerve and numbers with every succeeding hour; and, by the mismanagement of those on whom the direction of affairs rested, our troops became dispirited exactly in the same proportion as the confidence of the enemy was increased. Time and circumstances multiplied difficulties; till at length the army was driven to a diagonal capitulation, and annihilated.

From the accounts now before the public, it appears that Sir William Macnaghten was thwarted at a time when the safety of the army depended on his being cordially seconded by the military authorities. We are not certain that he will not be severely censured for having suggested at once to take on himself the responsibility of superseding the authority of General Elphinstone, and placing a more efficient officer and a more willing coadjutor at the head of the army. He might have exposed himself to the risk of censure had he taken this bold step, but a man who shrinks from such a risk is not equal to a great crisis. George the Third saved London during the riots of 1790 by calling out the troops of his own accord, when his Ministers seemed unwilling to incur the responsibility of such an act. He acted unconstitutionally on a great emergency; but he prevented the entire sack of the Capital; and the irregularity of his proceeding is entirely overlooked amidst the praise bestowed on his moral courage.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE SERAMPORE COLLEGE.

The last number of the Coke's Christian Enquirer informs us, that the Vedant will in future form no part of the public course of study in the Government Sanskrit College, and adds, that the friends of Mission must feel much pleasure at the announcement. We fear the Editor is rather too sanguine in his hopes, that the extinction of this particular class of studies will advance the Missionary cause in any perceptible degree. The learning which is still extended—and without which indeed the Institution would cease to be a College of Sanskrit Students—indisposes the mind of the student quite as effectually for the reception of Christian truth, as the dogmas of Veda Vyasa, embodied in the Vedant. Indeed there is nothing either in the philosophical or the mythological system of Hinduism which can be reconciled with the doctrines of Christianity, and the pundits do not become one whit less Hindoes, and are not advanced an inch towards the reception of the Gospel when they come to read the theology of the Vedanta. What may be the number of students who at the beginning of this year, were studying this abstruse and transcendental theology, we have not heard, but the number used to be one in twenty of the whole body. If the same ratio prevails at present, the cause for extinction lies within a very narrow compass, and is nothing more than that ten Brahmins have given up reading the works of the Vedant School—and will probably take up with the abstruse Poomras, or the obscure Tantras.

But it is a cause of congratulation, that a very great majority of the Sanskrit students have expressed the strongest wish to learn English. The study of our language commenced in October, and, in two months, 108 students out of 164, have enrolled themselves in the English classes. Nay, we are told that such is the avidity with which they seek English education that they need the curb as much now, as they formerly needed the spur. It has become necessary to inform them, that if they neglect their Sanskrit studies, they will be liable to expulsion from the College.

Here is a change, and a great change in an age of great changes. It is just eight years since the students of the Serampore College kicked the English language fairly out of the Institution. In the beginning of 1835, the English class was abolished, and the Chandrasekhara, our orthodox contemporary, could scarcely contain his joy on the occasion. He considered it most unusual, that any man engaged in the study of the holy scriptures, should pollinate himself with the burlesque study of English. His argument was irrefutable. If, said he, while any of the students may be engaged in the performance of religious rites, and promouncing the holy texts of the Veda, some English word should rise to his lips, the whole service would be profaned, and he must begin the pookah over again. Out then with the study of English from the Serampore College! In eight years the scene is changed; these feelings of hostility have been exchanged for those of a directly opposite character, and it has become necessary to moderate the ardour of the students for English, by threatening them with expulsion if they give up their minds exclusively to it.

While we are on the subject, we may as well quote the reasons which the Committee of Public Instruction gave for the abolition of English studies in 1835. "This measure was not reported to us, until it had been established by the result of a long trial that it will not answer as a general rule to teach two learned languages to the same students in this country. The period usually allotted to education is shorter by two or three years than it is in Europe, and except in rare instances, the effect of teaching two such languages as English and Sanskrit, or English and Arabic, is to give the student a smattering of both without a competent knowledge of either—or to overload his mind with words, without leaving him time for the acquisition of that knowledge as a medium for the communication of which those words are alone valuable." We are rather curious to know by what train of reasoning the Committee of Public Instruction has resolved so opposite a conclusion in so short a time. Is the present innovation likely to be accompanied in their estimation with the same disadvantages which were found to result from the former experiment; if not, by what process does the Committee hope to make the student equal master of both languages? To us it appears, that the opinion expressed by the members of the former Committee—of whom only two are now in the country, out of eleven—equally consonant with reason and experience; that if the attention of the student is given with ardor to Sanskrit, he will neglect English; if to English, he will shew in the pursuit of Sanskrit. We think the enthusiasm for English, which has now been displayed, cannot fail gradually to neutralize the Institution as a College of Sanskrit literature.

PURHOOD GRIEVANCES.—A large and very respectable meeting of Native gentlemen was held last Monday week at the Hall of the Sangharis College, when it was resolved to organize a new Society in Calcutta, for the acquisition and diffusion of information on all subjects connected with the welfare of India. Mr. George Thompson and six other European gentlemen were present on the occasion. The object of the proposed Association is as important as it is laudable. Accurate information in reference to the state of the people, and more especially of the productive classes, to the influence on public property and individual happiness of the institutions of the British Government, and to the result during the last fifty years, on the condition of the agricultural population, of that conversion of Collectors of revenue into Landholders which was effected by the decennial settlement, is indispensable to the improvement of the country. We require to know whether the people are more wretched and destitute under the British than they were under the Mohammedan administration; how much of that wretchedness is to be fairly traced to defective legislation, and how much to the corruption of the native officers, without whose aid the business of the country could not be conducted. But the enquiry must not stop with the discovery of the cause to which this misery is to be ascribed; to be of any value it must point out how these grievances are to be remedied; how Zemindars can be made conscientious and considerate, and ryots courageous in the defence of their rights and honest in the payment of their dues; how native officers can be made faithful in the discharge of their duties, and European functionaries can be brought to feel more deeply the weight of their responsibilities. Should the enquiries be pushed, as they might be, to the original construction of the Government; it will be necessary not only to point out the defects of the very odious machinery which has been put together at different times, and by men of different minds, during the last seventy years, for the management of India—that any man can do—but to give us the model of a more perfect system of administration, better adapted than the present to the wants and feelings of a hundred millions of people.

From the speeches which were delivered at the meeting, we have some small misgivings as to the capacity of the members of the new Society for so great a task. We fear that some of them have been led to suppose that nothing is necessary to fit them to legislate for India, beyond a disposition to abuse the existing Government. We allude more particularly to the declaration of Baboo Dabhoob Moonjeejee, in which he poured the vials of his indignation on this unfortunate Government, and charged it with having repeatedly violated engagements the most solemn.—in the very Hall which that Government had erected for the encouragement of Native education. In any other colonial possession but that of Great Britain, the language would have been punished as seditious. Such a speech at Batavia or Sumatra would have secured the speaker, as the mildest punishment, transportation to Amboyna. And not twenty years since, a man would no more have dreamed of uttering such sentiments in Calcutta, than he would of engaging in a high-way robbery. The best general answer to the objections brought by him against this arbitrary, this perfidious Government is the fact, that he is allowed to abuse it with such perfect impunity in its own metropolis.

The only instance which the Baboo brings forward of this perfidy and this solemn violation of pledges, is the question of Resumptions. They have now been brought nearly to a close, and any attempt to defend the measure, though it may be done by a simple reference to the printed declarations of Government from the time when it took the Collections into its own hand in 1773 to the year 1823, would appear redundant. The only course with which Government is really chargeable on this subject is, that it did not resume these lands earlier, and thus restore to the state the resources of which it had been deprived by the rapacity and villany of the Zemindars between 1765 and 1773, during its own minority.

The Baboo proceeds to the Courts of Justice in the interior. In Calcutta justice is perfect. We are happy to be assured of this. We have indeed heard that a Native, after having wasted sixteen years and two lakhs of Rupees in a law suit in Calcutta, and brought the Judges at length to a point, was informed that he ought to have brought his action at common law and not in equity. We have heard that a master had been held answerable for the fraud of his servant, but when that servant was arrested and prosecuted by his master, he was acquitted upon the principle that as he had carefully abstained from paying him, what he had taken in his name, he could not be said to have defrauded him of that which was never in his possession. But we quarrel with no man's taste. If the members of the meeting are satisfied with this dispensation of Justice, they are of course perfectly welcome to it.

The description however which the orator gives of the Mofussil courts—we have only the Hurkara's report before us—is perfect. He says the streams of justice have been poisoned, even if the fountain head remained pure. By the fountain head he evidently alludes to the European functionaries; by the streams, to the Native Amils. He speaks advisedly when he says, that it is "a system of bribery and corruption throughout," for the Government, with all its care and attention has hitherto been completely baffled by the venality of its Native officers. It has suspended them; fined them; and degraded them; but all to no purpose; the streams are not yet disinfected; the Shroffs and the Nazirs, and the Darogahs still continue to sell justice to the people, in spite of every effort; and what is worse, the people are, we fear, by no means so averse to this traffic of justice as some may think. However paradoxical it may appear, the body of the people are somehow or other of opinion, that what is obtained without price is of little value, and we are mistaken if they would not value the success of a suit to their own skill and management, and to the due application of motives, than to the virtue of solemn. But nothing can be more true than the preceding sentence, and thus it must remain unless the natives to whom justice is so denied, undertake the work of exposure and reformation. The remedy, as the Baboo observes, is in their own hands. Let the natives but undertake the work of reformation and the corrupt stream will be purified. Let him persuade various native officials to refrain from bribery and corruption, and our Courts will become a model of excellence; oppression will disappear from the soil of India, and the administration of justice will become, if possible, purer than it was in the golden age of India, in the days of the holy sage of the Hindoo calendar, when the laws of Manoo occupied the place of the Company's Regulations, and every man who slandered a Brahmin had melted lead poured down his throat.

After having disposed of the Courts, the Baboo proceeds to the last Charter, which ordained that no native of India should by reason of religion, place of birth, descent or color, be disabled from holding any place, office or employment under the Company. Yet, says he, the law is a dead letter, for an education at one of the Company's Colleges in England is deemed an indispensable pre-requisite for all the higher institutions in the gift of Government. This is a abundantly true, but unfortunately it is without remedy; for the same law which removed all disqualifications from the natives, confined for twenty years the privileges of the Civil Services, the members of which are educated at Hayleybury. There is a rumour that but for this positive enactment Lord Ellenborough would have abolished the Civil Service altogether, and distributed its offices among the Militia. The obstacle which the Governor General could not overcome, must continue for the next ten years to be an obstacle to the patriotic ambition of the Calcutta Baboos. They must bide their time. Perhaps on the expiration of the Charter, Parliament may see fit to abrogate Hayleybury, and distribute the Writships as prizes among the students of the Hindoo College, more especially if they should continue to exhibit such eminent qualifications for Government, as the speech we are now upon, displays.

The speaker asks, if it was not right and proper that those who knew so much of the country in consequence of their having been born and educated on the soil, should be permitted to share the places of trust and emolument now monopolized by Europeans, and contribute their aid in the due administration of the law. It is most right, and most proper; and Government has done not a little towards realizing the views of Parliament, in opening new offices to native talent. It has established Deputy Collectorships, placed Baboo Rameswar Dutt on the bench as a Commissioner, and given the native of the country original jurisdiction in all Civil suits of whatever amount, not excepting those in which Government itself is a party. In this respect Government has out-stripped the wishes of the people, for they appear to be little satisfied with the distribution of justice by Native Judges, and consider the Native tribunals as no better than scenes of venality and oppression. But let that pass. It is true that Government has not thrown upon the Supreme Council its Native ambition; but the country has other and more pressing wants to be attended to, before we reach this consummation. To speak seriously, we venture to think that the country at large would be more benefited if the salaries of the Durges and native officers of the Courts were raised to a scale, which, though it might not immediately secure honesty, would enable Government to enforce it more honestly, than if any of the alumni of the Hindoo College were appointed to the vacancy created in the Legislative Council by the departure of Mr. Amos.

In the hope expressed by the Baboo, that "the time would soon come when such an amount of public opinion would exist as would remove the evils of which they complained," we most cordially concur. This is to come to the point; it is to put the finger at once on the festering sore which debilitates the whole administration of justice. It is the want of public opinion in this country, that perpetuates public venality in spite of every effort of the state to remove it. The current of public opinion in the native community—the students of the Hindoo College always excepted—affords little or no encouragement to the growth of honest principles in the public service. No man is degraded in public estimation for adopting the process which has been in vogue in India during the last twenty centuries,—of turning his power into money. The native officer who has been confined in jail for years for the grossest peculation, re-enters society, on his liberation, without any stigma on his character. It is public opinion, and not the fear of legal consequences, which keeps the bench in England pure. That opinion is wanting here, and nothing can supply the absence of it;—no penalties, no rewards. Whenever those halcyon days arrive in which the man who has sold his official influence, and fattened on the spoil of a province shall be considered to have incurred the same degree of degradation, as the man who has eaten food with another of inferior caste, the task of Government in India will be abundantly lightened. We hope the discussions which the educated youths in Calcutta have now engaged in, will assist to hasten this period. We are happy to find their attention turned to the administration of public affairs, more especially of criminal and civil law. The more they examine the state of Courts, the more will they discover, that the remedy of existing evils lies more in the hands of the people, than of the Government; that if public opinion in the circle of native society be once enlisted on the side of truth, honesty, and justice, the defects of the European functionaries,—and they are by no means few—will be little felt. Without this aid, the most strenuous efforts of the most benevolent administration must be comparatively inefficient.

THE LAST OVERLAND MAIL.—An article from the Bombay Times will be found among our extracts, containing a very valuable notice relative to the receipt and despatch of letters by the Overland Mail. The number of letters sent to England from Bombay, on the 3d of February, amounted to 34,547; the number of newspapers to 12,157, in all 46,704. This is the largest single despatch of correspondence on record, by 32.

Astonishing as this increase may appear, there is something still more astonishing—something almost incredible in the amount of correspondence received from England. In the department of letters indeed there is considerable reciprocity. We received 33,928, and we sent 34,547, a little more than letter for letter; but while we sent some 12,157 newspapers we actually received 33,908, which shows plainly that however unusual the interest which has been excited at home in our sayings and doings, the interest we feel in the transactions of England is nearly three times as great as the interest which is felt there in the transactions of India. Seven years ago, when the community in Calcutta petitioned the India Board for the establishment of a monthly steam communication, the number of letters sent and received was stated at 300,000 in the year, or 25,000 a month; it has now risen to 67,773 in a single month. The item of newspapers was not taken into the calculation at all, yet the number sent and received in a single month now amounts to 56,065. If the number of copies dispatched and received in a month, from the middle of January to the 3d of February, in the present year, be taken as a criterion by which to judge of the rest of the year, there will probably be dispatched during the year 1843, one million three hundred and sixty thousand copies, instead of three hundred thousand formerly contemplated; but the number will doubtless rise to a million and a half, and in another year or two, possibly to two millions. We stand amazed at this stupendous increase of communication; and ask how we ever managed to carry on the system of social and commercial intercourse, by way of the Cape. And this carries the mind onward to the future; and we enquire, how existence could be sustained in India if this regular supply of monthly nourishment was at once cut off, and we were again thrown on the resources furnished by the navigation round the Cape. But the spirit shrinks from the contemplation of such a calamity, and we exclaim, there cannot, there must not be another war, to break up this chain of communication, and place us again at a distance from the civilised world, and weaken the sympathies which bind us to our own land.

THE MEETING AT THE HINDOO COLLEGE.—A meeting was held last week of the enlightened Native youth of Calcutta in the Hall of the Hindoo College, at which Capt. Richardson, the Principal of that Institution, was invited to be present. The business of the evening appears to have consisted in listening to an Essay of Baboo Dukin Mookerjee, the gentleman whose speech we have noticed in another column. It was of the same complexion with the speech. It was filled with the most unqualified abuse of the Government of India and its institutions, and was calculated, though it may not have been designed, to sow the seeds of dissimulation towards the British administration in the minds of the youths who surrounded him. It was loudly and repeatedly applauded by the auditory, more especially in those passages which denounced the public authorities with particular acrimony.

Capt. Richardson, after having listened for some time to this tirade, at length rose and expressed his regret that the youths of the Hindoo College should make so ill a use of the education they had received from Government as to join so heartily in the abuse of it. He maintained that the sentiments in the Essay bordered closely on treason, and that if this course was persisted in, he could not allow them the further use of the Hall. This interruption exasperated the patriots, and the Chairman rebuked the Principal in severe language for his conduct, and called upon him to apologise for it. In the report furnished by the Harbinger of the proceedings, it is asserted that the Principal expressed his regret for what he had said, and retracted his censure. A letter under his own signature, which appeared in the journals of Tuesday, however assumes us, that while he expressed his regret for having, as they asserted, wounded their feelings, he refused to qualify his opinion of the impropriety of such addresses.

We have no doubt that Capt. Richardson was actuated by the purest impulse in the course he pursued. He must have felt no little mortification to find the intellectual advantages which Government had afforded the youth, employed in undermining its authority. He felt doubtless the impropriety of allowing the Hall which had been built by Government for the purposes of education, turned into an arena for seditious declamation. Still we regret that he interfered publicly on the occasion, and thus afforded the patriots an opportunity of representing themselves as the martyrs of freedom. Perhaps there is nothing so entirely harmless as these declamations of the young Baboos of the Hindoo College. A Government that has stood the fire of the Mahomedan press, in a period of great excitement, when its denunciations were supported by a reference to the army before Herat, which was said to be destined for the reconquest of India, can have nothing to dread from a few dissipated harangues in the College Hall of Calcutta, from men who have not the slightest influence in the country. Whatever information these essays contain which may tend to enlighten the minds of the public authorities, as to the cause or the remedy of public grievances, will be received with thankfulness. The seditious froth, Government is strong enough in the benevolence of its motives, and in its physical energies, to despise. The best mode of treating such occasions, is to take no notice of them, whether delivered at the College Hall, or the Town Hall, or any Hall in Calcutta.

THE CALCUTTA BIBLE SOCIETY.—Amongst our Selections will be found a paper which has been communicated to the Christian Observer, and ourselves, by the Committee of the Calcutta Bible Society; and to which we are desirous of calling the attention of our readers. The subject of the paper is the spelling of the name Jehovah, in the Oxford translations of the Scriptures: a matter of no very great importance in itself; and about which we see no good reason for differing from the choice the Committee has made in its orthography.

The subject however is exactly one of those admirably adapted to furnish a party Stillebeld. Perhaps the best rule, about the names of either persons or things, is, to use them in that way by which their objects shall be most readily and distinctly recognized. Etymological nicety is often a matter of pedantry, than of reason or utility. Some might contend it was so even in the case before us, notwithstanding the stress actually laid upon the original import of our Lord's name, in the Sacred Scriptures. It might be held, that the correspondence between the name and the work of our Redeemer was intended to make its natural impression at the dawn of his appearance; and being in fact incommunicable in the great majority of the languages of the world, its communication in any of them, during the beginning of the gospel, was of very secondary importance. At the same time the sacred associations of the name are such, as easily to come its being raised to a symbol that shall be taken as a sort of test of reverence for Him who bore it: and so it may be fought about like any other indifferent thing, made great by human willfulness.

We are sorry to think there should be any apprehension to this perversion in the present case, but cannot help fearing that there is. This question of spelling appears worthy of the consideration of the Bible Society: and, when it had been examined, and decided on by the Committee, it was fit and proper to communicate the grounds of their decision through the press, to all who are engaged or interested in Biblical translations. So far we approve of the proceedings of the Calcutta Bible Committee. But, unless we are misinformed, they have done more. Their paper is introduced by a notification, that they have adopted a certain spelling of the name Jesus, in Oordoo translations of the Scriptures; and this intimation runs smooth enough. But we have heard it worded differently—or in the positive fashion, that the Committee will not print any Oordoo translation of the Scriptures, the author of which will not consent to adopt the Committee's spelling.

Now if this be the meaning of the Committee's resolution, we think it improper to the last degree. It is not right, by dictating to them in this way, to reduce Biblical translators to mere literary hacks. Much less is it right for any Committee to assume to themselves the office of publishing the word of God under their authority, as if it should not pass current without their imprimatur. The only legitimate way to get at pure translations is by successive improvements on what has gone before, untroubled by prescription and favoritism. And since Bible Societies have begun to single out particular names and terms, which they insist are to be translated and spelt as they choose to determine, under pain of forfeiture of all assistance from them, there is no saying to what length they will go. They are as liable to error as other bodies of men; and it is impossible to say, how soon their resolutions will pass from such harmless subjects as the spelling of names. By their interferences the Parent Bible Society has cut off the Baptist Denomination from its confederation. It also turned away a worthy Presbyterian translator, the Rev. W. Glen of Perth. The Calcutta Auxiliary appears fully disposed to keep pace with its Parent in giving occasion for offence. We would earnestly recommend their stopping in this course. Let the translators who favour them with their services have all the countenance and assistance that can be given; but let not counsel take the form of imperative orders, or be infused by pains and penalties.

MR. BLUNDELL.—We are enabled through the kindness of a friend to present our readers with the following sketch of the services of Mr. Blundell, the Commissioner of the Tenasserim Provinces, who will shortly be superseded by Major Broadfoot. We have already expressed our opinion of this supersession, which is not only unjust towards Mr. Blundell, but forms a pernicious precedent. At the same time, no man will begrudge the defender of Jellalabad, any reward, however great it may be. But we are happy to learn, from general yet uncontradicted rumour, that the prospect of Mr. Blundell's succeeding Mr. Bonham in the Government of the Straits Settlements, is exceedingly probable. In that case the personal injury towards him will have been amply redressed.

MR. BLUNDELL.

A successor to Mr. E. A. Blundell, in the important office of Commissioner of the Tenasserim Provinces, having been nominated by the Right Honourable the Governor-General, we are furnishing the following sketch of the character and public services of that gentleman who is interesting to the public and useful to his fellow servants.

Mr. Blundell was educated at the India Company's Military Seminary at Addiscombe, where he made such progress in Mathematics and Fortification as to become one of the first appointees of his season in the Bengal Engineers; but as he had displayed much general talent at the examination, he, the late Sir George Robinson, predicted that he would soon rise to distinction in the Civil Service of the Company, and recommended him, instead of coming to Bengal as a Cadet of Engineers, or remaining in England to enter Leyburn College, to proceed at once as a Writer to the Presidency of Prince of Wales's Island, offering him, at the same time, an appointment to that place. He accepted this offer, and arrived at Penang in the year 1821, just as the Governor, Mr. Phillips, was organizing a plan for settling the scattered population of the island, which had become involved in the utmost confusion. His knowledge of Surveying came immediately into use, and he was appointed an Assistant to the Collector of the Straits Settlements, and shortly after, his readiness at figures and excellent habits of business, led to his being employed also as the Custom House Officer, and, owing to his immediate superior, Mr. A. D. Maingay, having been promoted to the position of Province Wellesley, he finally had the entire charge, notwithstanding, at this time, he had not been four years in the service. During just of the year 1824, Governor Fullerton further employed him as Secretary to Government. But, although his services were so much in request, he found time to acquire a thorough knowledge of the Malay language, in which he passed a very creditable public examination, and he made himself perfectly at home in the Hindustani tongue also.

In the year 1825, the Governor General having determined upon establishing a Civil Administration in the newly conquered Burmese Province of Tavoy and Mergul under the direction of the Governor of Penang, and Mr. Fullerton having, more happily, selected Mr. A. D. Maingay for the office of Commissioner of those places, at the earnest request of that gentleman, Mr. Blundell was appointed to accompany him as his Assistant. From the commencement of the Burmese war in the year preceding, Mr. Blundell had been giving some attention to the Burmese language, and consequently, very shortly after he had been placed in civil charge of Mergul, he qualified himself sufficiently, not only to communicate freely with the people under him, but to translate all Mr. Maingay's rules and regulations for the judicial and fiscal administration of the new territory.

In 1827, when Moulemin was added to Mr. Maingay's charge, he requested Mr. Blundell from Mergul to the former place, in order to assist him to introduce the new civil administration into that large and more important Province; and in 1829, when Colonel Burney was ordered to proceed to Ava as British Resident, Mr. Blundell succeeded him as Deputy Commissioner at Tavoy, and took charge of the two southern Provinces of Tavoy and Mergul, where, in the following year, after having visited every village in them, and with great personal exertion, he completed a new Settlement of the Land Revenue for a certain fixed period, on terms satisfactory to the people and advantageous to the Government. About this time also he was employed by Mr. Maingay to visit the Siamese Chief to the north of Junk-Ceylon, and the Siamese told him to turn his attention to the Siamese language, and to acquire a competent knowledge of that tongue also.

In 1831, Colonel Burney having reported the necessity of his quitting Ava for a time on account of the impaired state of his health, Mr. Maingay desired Mr. Blundell to relieve that officer, and he, accordingly officiated for several months in the office of British Resident, and his intimate knowledge of the Burmese language, excellent temper and mild manners rendered him an especial favorite with the late King and the whole of his Court, and particularly with the Princess-Princess of Mekkharah, and the present Maharajah, then Prince of Tharavadi, who, on the departure of Mr. Blundell, expressed an earnest hope that he would soon return to them. While at Ava, he obtained copies of a great number of Burmese works on their religion, history and laws, and secured most of them with the aid of his friend, the Prince of Mekkharah, and hence, he became not only the most fluent speaker in that language, but unquestionably the best read in Burmese literature of any Englishman in existence.

At Ava also he found time to acquire some knowledge of the Persian language.

In the year 1833, when Mr. Maingay left Moulemin for the purpose of proceeding to Europe, Mr. Blundell succeeded him as Commissioner of the Tenasserim Provinces. He has therefore been in this important and most responsible charge for a period of nearly ten years, and if the supposition is not altogether unfounded, that he is one of the first objects of a Governor's duty, we know that the whole Native population of Tenasserim will declare with one voice, that they owe a large debt of gratitude to Mr. Blundell, and that they can never expect to meet again with so kind, considerate and popular a chief. In manners mild in temper, superstitious and always cheerful, he is devoid of indolence, patient almost to a fault, active, intelligent, zealous, accessible to the meanest at all hours of the day or night, and when we add, an intimate acquaintance with the language, laws, customs and prejudices of the people under him, we may surely say, that such qualities, in their combination, are not to be met with.

Under Mr. Blundell one of the most able and valuable public officers now in the service of the India Company. We appeal to many Gentlemen who have visited Moulemin from three Provinces, and seen Mr. Blundell in the midst of his labours, to say whether we have exaggerated the merits in this respect. We do not desire to be heard bearing a high public office, who inspected the Provinces in 1824, declare, that he had never seen so young a man as Mr. Blundell then was, except the extensive powers and authority which he was vested, with so much forbearance and consideration towards the Natives. In his private character also we know him to be liberal, charitable and benevolent, and we desire here to state his public merits only. His mind was always intent upon deriving means for developing the resources of the Provinces, and encouraging that commerce and agriculture, and he freely parted with large sums out of his own private means to induce others to bring the Tin and Iron ore found at Tavoy and Mergul into notice in England, and to engage in the cultivation of Cotton and Sugar at Moulemin. Captain McLeod's aid Dr. Richardson's Missions to the Shan countries, and the frigate's arrival at Moulemin from England direct, as well from the Indian Presidencies, and the large number of troops and stores sent to the years of the task of that place, are all proofs of Mr. Blundell's earnest and successful endeavours to extend and improve the Commerce of the Provinces.

It is true, that one or two European settlers at Moulemin have occasionally addressed letters to the Calcutta Newspapers in disparagement of Mr. Blundell's measures, but even they admit the integrity of his character and his low qualifications for his office, and on his approaching departure from Moulemin, we shall see how readily the large majority of the European settlers will join the Native population, in offering their testimony to the great merits of his long administration. It is true also, that the late Governor-General did not entirely assent to Mr. Blundell's opinions as to the proper course of policy to be observed towards Burmah, but on this subject we can only allow ourselves to say, that Mr. Blundell's opinions were founded on a personal acquaintance with the character and modes of thinking of the Burmese, and a personal knowledge of the character and feelings of the British as they appeared at his Court, and his public spirit, zeal and manliness would not allow him to be silent when he believed his superiors were going wrong.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

—The last Official Gazette contains the correspondence between Lord Stanley and Lord Fitzgerald and the Duke relative to the medals bestowed on the troops who have been distinguished by Lord Ellenborough. Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to permit the officers and troops of her Army to wear the same decorations which have been accorded to the Company's troops.

—The office of Special Resumption Commissioner for the Patna division has, we learn, been allocated. The few notices on the file have been transferred to the file of the Judge. The rapid abolition of class offices, though evidently owing to the completion of the duties of the office, were we established will be placed in the opinion of nine-tenths of the prople the credit of Dr. Mathan's continued home. The great bulk of the country, down to the very bottom who ply on the river at Calcutta, is strongly impressed with the idea that it was this object which took him to England.

—Moulana papers to the 25th have arrived, but they are devoid of interesting intelligence. A new vessel of 600 tons had just been launched. She is, as usual, said to be well and faithfully built, and to reflect great credit, &c. &c. During the past year no fewer than eight vessels, of 2500 tons burden, have been launched at Madras, a town which has no existence sixteen years ago.

—The Roman Catholic Bishop of Ave, with a large supply of priests, had arrived at Moulana.

—The Delhi Gazette says, the Civilians have at length received their boon from the Governor General; and that those of the North West Province have been informed that two, three, or five hundred Rupees will be topped off from their salaries. The boon has, it must be confessed, been somewhat amusingly distributed. The salaries of India to the officers; rewards to the army; double grant to the soldiers; and retrenchment to the Civilians.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10.

—The grand party given by Col. Powney, in honor of our successes in Asia, on Wednesday evening last, is described by those who were present as having been magnificent. The illumination was really splendid, and did great credit to the taste of the host. We have borrowed a brief description of it from one of our contemporaries.

—At the last meeting of the Agricultural Society, Dr. Griffith was appointed Vice President and Member of the Committee of Papers in the room of Dr. Grant.

—The latest accounts from Lahore state, that Dost Mahomed had arrived at that capital, where he had been very honorably received by Sher Singh. It seems a strange circumstance, that at the very time when Akbar Khan is said to be threatening an attack on Peshawar, and endeavoring to gather a large army of fanatics, and commencing a religious war on the Indian Felix, his father should be residing at the Lahore Court apparently on the most friendly footing with the chief. One of the last orders issued from Lahore was, to put five hundred mounds of gunpowder into the fort at Attock.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

—The Bombay Press publishes letters from Ogletoke to the 17th January. This place is the Head Quarters of the large force now assembled in Seinde. Major Outram had arrived there from the Camp of Sir Charles Napier at Somnagar, which place has been completely dismantled and destroyed, because the Chief fled from it with several lakhs of Rupees three days before the General reached it. It is now a heap of ruins. It is said that although the Chief of Hyderabad was most peaceably inclined, yet our troops are to march on that capital. The villages on the route have been despoiled.

—We gather from the Colombo Observer, that the Bishop of Calcutta has publicly denounced the Trinitarian doctrine as Ceylon as he did in Calcutta. The same paper states, that with perhaps one exception, the Colonial Chaplains have have imbibed the Oxford doctrine; and that many lay members of their congregation have been led into the same error.

—General Shekton has been acquitted of three of the charges brought forward against him, and found guilty only of one, that of having entered on a chivalrous correspondence with Uthar Khan in order to procure force for his horse. But as this matter was disposed of at the time by a court for its impropriety, the Court have declined to pass sentence upon it; and the Commander-in-Chief approves of the Court's determination. He is therefore released from arrest, and directed to follow the remains of the 44th to England. Thus the Court Martials have all ended in the acquittal of the Prisoners.

—Another batch of Coffins is now under despatch to the Mauritius on the Exultet. It is said that a great number of them consist of Coffins who had returned to India after having served their time on the island. If this be the case, it speaks strongly in favor of the treatment they received there.

—The Barque Solenne, of 283 tons, has just been brought up to Calcutta from the tail of the reef, by the Commander, without the aid of any pilot, as none was available when the vessel reached the Sand Head.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

—The Mail of the present month was detained at Bombay from the 1st to the 2d, two days beyond the usual time; but the cause of the detention is not given; it is supposed however to be connected with the despatches of the Governor General.

—The Colombo Observer has seized the opportunity of the Metropolitan visitation at the island of Ceylon, to visit the Archbishop with his special indignation. One of the charges brought against the Venerable Archbishop is, that of trafficking in Coffee; and there seems to be some ground for the accusation, for we find Bishop Wilson in his Charge alluding to it, and stating that he had made it a matter of special reference to England.

—We have news from China to the 14th of January. It has reached Calcutta in less than a month. The Emperor continues to put his wrath on the officers who were unable to prevent the successes of the English during the last war. Yin shan, Yih king, and Wan wei, "who ought to have been as disinterested, faithful and true in their public duty as an arrow is to its mark, injured the troops, wasted the public money, and still and lost opportunities, turned their backs on the Emperor's favour, and deceived their own hearts," then which there can be no greater crime.

The Emperor, though the two former are his own sons, has ordered them to be degraded and decapitated. There had been no fresh disturbance at Canton; trade was uninterrupted; though the merchants are said still to tremble for their safety. The High Commissioner Eliepo, arrived at Canton on the 10th of January to settle the Tariff, and the future commercial relations of the English and Chinese, and immediately placed himself in communication with Sir Henry Pottinger, who had asked the advice of the merchants on the subject of duties. Five of their body had been appointed a Committee to confer with him on the subject.

—Major Elford Pottinger has, we perceive, obtained his furlough, and will proceed to England. Of those who have taken a prominent part in affairs beyond the India, four officers, Col. Shelton, Major Outram, Major Pottinger and Major Macgregor, will shortly be on their way to our native land.

—The Governor General entered the city of Delhi, with imperial pomp on the morning of Sunday the 8th instant, surrounded by a dozen or two of Nabobs, Rajahs, Vakeels, &c. all mounted on elephants. His Lordship, it is said, intended to pass a fortnight at Delhi, receiving the homage of the Native chiefs.

—The copy of a letter from General Elphinstone, written at Baddelad, the 23d February, has just been published. It was accompanied by an account of the "unfortunate occurrence" at Cabul, which ended in the destruction of the army. As those events have now passed from the sphere of politics to the province of History, we hope Government will permit these documents to see the light.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

—The Madras Government has just published a letter sent out by the Court of Directors four years ago, prohibiting the employment of any Civil Servant in any district with the vernacular language of which he is not acquainted. It has been determined to attend strictly to this rule as far as practicable. It would be well if it were so in every arrangement could be made for giving effect to this Order of the Court; for it is a fact that many of the young Civilians are sent from College as qualified for the service, and employed in Bengal with the language of which they are so little acquainted, as to be unable to comprehend any thing of the documents or proceedings before them.

—We are happy to learn that the Governor General has appointed Sir Richmond Shakerpear as Assistant to Major Riesenman in Baddelad. The services of this distinguished officer in liberating prisoners, Russian, Russian, and English, were the warmest return from Government. It was he who finally prevailed on the Khan of Khiva to release the Russians held in slavery through that Khan, and who convinced them to the Russian frontier. We are extremely in consequence of this act, that the Emperor published his resolution not to interfere with the affairs of Central Asia. To Sir Richmond also are we indebted in a great measure for the release of our prisoners in Afghanistan, since there is every reason to fear that if he had not pushed on as he did, they would have been intercepted by Akbar's party. We have only therefore to regret that the post with which he is rewarded is of such inferior value, though we hope it will lead to something better.

—The Harbors states on the authority of a Mutual letter that the brave Goorka Regiment was not entirely annihilated at Chavak, and that two hundred have at different times found their way to our own provinces.

—It appears that the Captain of the H. C. Steamer Mowat at Bombay has been fined 50 Rupees for delivering a packet from Singapore six days after the arrival of the vessel. The Captain of the Mowat and the Childe Harold were fined 200 Rs. for the same offence.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

—The Star states that the Semnath Gates are not to be brought on to Delhi, but to remain at Brindaban. There we hope they will remain. However injudicious it may be to foster Hinduism by such a compliment, this procedure would be far less objectionable than the pompous conveyance of them to the sea coast and the provision of a temple to receive them. The Governor General has acted wisely in altering his determination and preventing the exhibition of them at Delhi.

—The Bishop of Calcutta has, we find publicly acknowledged his error in having denounced the cross worn by the Cingulow, as symbols of idolatry. His Lordship stated that he had been misinformed on the subject.

—We are sorry to find it affirmed that Sir George Arthur, the Governor of Bombay, has announced his determination not to give of invitation to the entertainments given by Nat vs. If the Governor General, or our subordinate Governor thinks it right to adopt the rule of refusing all invitations, whether presented by Europeans or Natives, we will not quarrel with his determination; but to draw a line of distinction between the two classes, is any thing less prudent or politic.

—The Harbors states that the aggregate amount of property stolen in Calcutta last year was, one lakh and sixty seven thousand Rupees, or at the rate of four hundred and fifty-four Rupees daily. But this simple fact, is not so strong a proof of the inefficiency of the Police, as would be afforded by the number of burglaries. Even in the best ordered police, large sums have been purloined by clever rogues. The whole of this sum might have been taken away in two robberies; and if there had been no others during the year, this would rather have been a proof of the efficiency of the Police.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

ON THE NAME OF THE SAVIOUR, IN URDU TRANSLATIONS OF THE SACRED SCRIPTURES.

[The Committee of the Calcutta Auxiliary Bible Society having resolved to adopt the form عيسوع for the name of the Saviour in Urdu translations of the Sacred Scriptures, have recorded at length the grounds of their resolution in the following minute.]

The Committee having considered the different modes which have been proposed for adoption, in writing the name of the Saviour in the versions of the New Testament printed in the Arabic character, and the various arguments and objections by which they are severally supported or opposed, deem it due to the importance of the subject, as well as to the Missionary brethren, who have favoured them with their opinions, to record at length the reasons which have induced them to come to the resolution they have adopted.

An analysis of the returns which have been received by the Committee, shows the following results of the number of votes for each mode of writing the name—for عيسوع	7

for يسوع	3
for ايسوع	2

The first is the present usual mode of rendering the name of the Saviour. It has been followed, with few exceptions, for 1200 years, has been adopted in the Koran, and by all Mohammedan writers, and also in the Persian and Urdu publications of the Auxiliary Bible Society, until a very recent period when the fourth, or last mentioned mode was substituted. The second differs from the fourth only in the lengthening of the first syllable. The third is altogether new as regards the publication of the Society.

In the practice of hundreds of years, and in the opinions of some of the most experienced Missionaries in Upper India, the Committee recognize the necessity that is imposed upon them, of proceeding upon grounds the most sure, and for reasons the most satisfactory, in arriving at any conclusion opposed to their practice, &c. or in variance with those opinions. They believe, however, that such do exist, and that they will be found on examination fully to support the resolution of the Committee.

The letters of the Hebrew root יָשַׁע to save, from which the name of Jesus is derived, are represented by the Arabic letters ي and ع, or in their combination يع. The name of the Saviour is written in Hebrew ישוע, the letters of which would be represented in Arabic by ي and ع, or in their combination يع. It will be seen that in both the root and the derivative the initial letter is י or ي, and the final letter ע or ع.

By Mohammedans the name of the Saviour is written يسوع, thus directly inverting the proper order, and making the ع the initial, and the ي the final letter. Here is a clear violation of the principle which have regulated the orthography of all other Biblical names, for the name of the Saviour is the only one to which such a remark is applicable.

But there is a further serious objection to the continued use of the word يسوع, inasmuch as it has no signification whatever, nor can it in any way be said to convey the meaning of the original word, to which it bears so affinity or resemblance. Of numerous lexicons and other authorities which have been examined, the only one which professes to give the derivation of the name يسوع is Shakespeare's Dictionary, in which the transposition of the initial and final letters is the more clearly shown by the Hebrew and Arabic terms being brought into juxtaposition.

It may be urged as an argument for the continuance of the usual mode of spelling that preceding translators, especially Martyn's, have adhered to it. It does not appear that Martyn was ever required to consider the point in the manner in which it is now brought before the Bible Society. No objection was raised in his time to the mode of spelling previously adopted; and it is possible that the subject did not present itself then prominently to his mind. But even were the supposition that it did, there might have been various reasons for a translator adhering to the generally recognized mode of spelling in the infancy of modern Scripture translation, which do not all with equal force at the present period.

But even Martyn himself might furnish an argument against the retention of the Mohammedan mode of writing the Saviour's name. The name of Joshua, which is derived from the same root as the Jews, occurs twice in the New Testament; once at Acts vi. 45, and again at Hebrews iv. 11. In his Urdu Testament Martyn has given the name of Joshua in the former passage as يسوع and in the latter as يسوع. In his Persian Testament he has given the name in both places as يسوع. It is clear therefore that the name as spelt in Hebrews iv. 11, of his Urdu Testament was a mere oversight, and that he would have written the name of Joshua as يسوع or يسوع. There is not a single authority for making ع the initial, and ي the final letter of Joshua's name, nor has any one ever contended for it. And if so, the Committee cannot see with what force it can be maintained that a method directly the reverse should be adopted in regard to the name of Jesus.

For the above reasons, and for others which will be hereafter alluded to, the Committee are clearly of opinion that the present usual mode of writing the Saviour's name should be abandoned. Whether by way of reverence, or whether for any other cause, it is manifest that the name has been corrupted by Mohammed and his followers, and it is the duty of the Church of Christ to restore it to its proper form and signification.

It remains to be determined what name shall be substituted in lieu of that which the Committee propose to discard. Two have been suggested, viz. يسوع and ايسوع. The second and fourth above mentioned may be considered as the same for the purposes of this discussion. The arguments and objections for and against each of these names, the Committee will consider in detail.

* The first editions of Martyn's Persian and Hindustani New Testament are here alluded to. In Greek both Joshua and Jesus are written Ιησους.

† ישוע, Jesus Nazarene. יהושע Iterum vel quod negat positum vultus saluatore, vel quod alias ob diffinitum Iterum vel pronuntiatum et abscisum vocem. Arabic scriptum يسوع Jesus, et in Alemaico ܝܫܘܥ Iai, per ܝܫܘܥ Iterum transpositum. —Schleiermacher's Pictorial Edition.

It will be as well, before proceeding further, to advert to the practice which has been uniformly adopted in the several editions of the Bible in the version of the Holy Scriptures, in writing the name of the Saviour. In the original of the New Testament, the name Ιησους is the Greek form of the Hebrew ישוע, and the name of Hebrew derivation is explained in the passage, αυτος ο υιος του ανθρωπου αρα τον αμαρταν σωσει, which is the general rendering of the name Hebrew root and its derivative in the Old Testament Scriptures. Every authorized version in existence has adopted the same plan, and, following the Greek in taking the name of the Saviour, has given the explanatory clause of Matthew i. 21, in a similar manner.

Following this rule in the Arabic, Persian and Urdu languages, the name of the Saviour would be يسوع or, representing the Hebrew י by the letter ي as is frequently done in proper names, يسوع.

It is urged, however, in favor of the word ايسوع that "its similarity of sound with the Mohammedan term points it out as the probable form of the Saviour's name before the Mohammedan era; the Mohammedan either took heretofore or intends to spell it, not venturing to attempt any change in the sound of the names of the renowned prophet of Nazareth, whose supernatural or infidelities he and whose numerous followers were not to be denied; and that at least there is no evidence to the contrary."

It cannot be that the author of the Koran intentionally altered the Saviour's name. A commentary on the life of Mahomed, by Ibrahim of Haleb, published at Cairo in 1683, states that, "Warha, the son of Yusef, the brother of Khadija, had become a Christian, and translated the Gospels into Hebrew into Arabic." Whether this be true or not, the Koran bears internal evidence of the author's intimate acquaintance with the text of the New Testament Scriptures; and the marked corruption of the Saviour's name made thereby he needed rather to design than to ignore it.

The conjecture that Mahomed would not have ventured to change the sound of the name of Jesus of Nazareth is equally untenable. If it were the Saviour of the world, there was no room for the pretensions of Mahomed. If the very name of Messiah among the early Christians of Arabia pointed out him who had been the Nazarene, who was ample cause why the false prophet should wish to see it for ever put aside. Something towards this end he accomplished, when the mode of writing it was corrupted. But still in mentioning this name, the very sound proclaimed the great truth involved in it; and thus it was just as essential to the scheme of Mahomed that the sound, as well as the orthography, of the name of Jesus should be corrupted.

It cannot be disputed that there is no direct historical evidence to show the manner of writing the Saviour's name in Arabic before the Mohammedan era; and though the Christian religion was early preached in Arabia, there is nothing to warrant the conclusion that any versions of the Scriptures in Arabic are older than the seventh century. But it is from the same period that the Mohammedan literature of Arabia takes its rise, into the bosom of this, it is not necessary to inquire; the fact is sufficient for the present purpose.

New authorities occur in showing that يسوع is the only name by which the Saviour is designated in the Christian literature of Arabia; and every version of the New Testament in Arabic to which the Committee have access has the name written in that form. The supposition then that Mahomed, though he did not scruple to alter the orthography, would not venture to change the sound of the name of the Saviour whom he desired, can only co-exist with still more ignorant and unreasonable conclusions, and that the Christians did not hesitate to alter both the orthography and sound of the name of the Saviour, whom they professed.

Though direct historical evidence of a period prior to the Mohammedan era is wanting, the committee would refer, in passing, to the evidence of ancient and kindred languages. The Syriac, in which the Hamaanyri dialect of Arabic was nearly allied, and the Hebrew, to which the Koran bears a close affinity with the Arabic, are the same form as that which is found in the existing Arabic versions of the New Testament. In fact the name of

THE SANGHERI COLLEGE—IMPEDIMENT TO EDUCATION.

We extract the following items from the last Annual Report of the Sangheri College, which, we are sure, will afford sincere gratification to those who desire to know the progress of the orders of the Honourable the Court of Directors, and of the Government of India, and also to the wishes of a wider circle of the students. English classes were established in October last, and their establishment, up to this period (31st Dec. 1863), 108 students are now admitted to the English class, who reside on the site of the college. The time for study in the English class has been fixed at two hours daily. The study with which the students seek to excel is such, that the section apprehending the neglect of their Sangheri studies, considered it proper to notify, that if any of the students failed very materially in any branch of Sangheri examination at the annual and half-yearly examinations, he should be liable to expulsion from the College. It is important that the students should be encouraged with vigour in this country; but the Sangheri College under its present management, is inadequate to this object. As the vernaculars should be combined with the study of English, so should English be taught simultaneously with the Sangheri. Missionaries can have little hope of making any religious impression on Brahmins, who are so much as they are prejudiced by the subtleties and abstruseness of Sanskrit lore; as well might we attempt to make the principles of common sense self-evident to an instance of Berkeley's Idealism, or Thomas Aquinas and Scholasticism. The murky haze of Vedantism and Sangheri metaphysics does not allow of an opening for the beams of European knowledge to penetrate. Could the Brahmins be induced to co-operate in the spread of European knowledge as Mr. Wilkinson aimed so strenuously after, a mighty impulsion to the reception of truth would be removed.—Christian Intelligence.

NEW PERIODICALS.

Periodical literature is of great importance in the present day; by diffusing knowledge previously stored up in bulky folios—exciting a taste for reading, and calling forth talent in short essays, &c. It is important to the cause of religion, and rendered subservient to the cause of religion. America first set the example in this respect. India is imitating the example of America, and is producing a kind of new numbers of "The Morning Star," a weekly periodical issued at Jaffa in Ceylon, containing articles on Missions, religious customs, religious literature, and the like in Tamil and English languages. It is calculated to be useful to the Native Christians in Ceylon. On observing the curious nature of the Tamil characters, we wished that Ceylon had only some Travellers who would agitate the question of introducing the Roman character. This is the second weekly periodical of a religious nature started in Ceylon; the former one was discontinued because it "had plenty of subscribers who did not pay." As education now the English language are making rapid advances in Ceylon we hope there will be sufficient interest excited to support this one.

The Madras Christian Herald, a weekly publication, at the low price of 6 Roppees per annum, also deserves notice. It is conducted by an Evangelical Churchman, a Chaplain, on the principles of the Church of England, and we hope it may check the spreading of the pernicious principles of Trinitarianism which are so rife at Madras. Why should there be so much political news in it?—Christian Intelligence.

THE CONVERSION AND MARTYR OF A HINDOO YOUTH.

A student of the Hindoo College, (3d class, 2nd department,) named Madanoo Das, had for some time past been conversing with the religion of his fathers and to embrace Christianity. It is very singular, that before he had actually made up his mind to take this step, he had received, by clerical intrusion wherever he went, in the habit of reading books and tracts by himself. A few weeks ago, he presented himself before a dyspeptic Minister of the Gospel, and stated his willingness to embrace the religion which he had read, and was highly interested in the progress he exhibited in himself of a sound faith and a well-grounded conviction. His relations having been men of wealth and respectability, he was called upon to give an account of his progress and trouble. He withstood their opposition with great firmness and continued steadfast in his determination, which is truly heroic. The vehement severity was sent to him, with a request, that he should immediately take his passage to England, and get baptised there—that an obloquy might be cast upon his family by his embracing Christianity on the spot. He refused to accept of the gift upon such conditions, and was baptised in the Old Church near Thiruvai, by the Venerable Archbishop Dastley. He had been accustomed to write poetry in the Hindoo College, and several of his productions were printed in the Literary Gazette and other periodicals. He composed a hymn on the occasion of his baptism, of which the following is a copy:—

STAR—BY M. S. DUTT.

[A stanza revised.]

I Long morn in Sapphorah's night,
By Sin and Satan's power;
I saw no—saw not for the light,
That lead the Blind to Heaven: II.

I sat in darkness—Reason's eye
Was shut,—was closed in me:—
I hastened to Eternity
O'er Error's dreadful Sea! III.

But now, at length thy grace, O Lord!
Bids all around me shine:
I drink thy sweet,—thy precious word,—
I feel before thy throne! IV.

I've broke Affliction's tender ties
For my most Saviour's sake!
All, all I love beneath the skies
Lord I for Thee forsake!

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PRINCIPLES WILL IN APPREHENSION.
To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—In your issue of the 14th instant, you have fairly and ably alluded to the events of the past year, especially the providential and happy deliverance of our captives, at the eleventh hour, from a hopeless and dreary captivity; all hearts must respond to this feeling; but one sad and painful feeling has been cast on our reflections from Afghanistan: shall no effort be made to rescue the still remaining unfortunate but faithful Sepoys and followers left in the enemy's hands? And such an enemy: if reports are as all to be credited, it is much to be feared that we still left many Hindoostees to linger out a sad servitude, and experience the revenge of our enemies. Surely some effort, for the sake of our honour and humanity, should be made to recover these still missing. Why was not their release made a condition of Don Mahomed's? who has been sent so hurriedly back, it would have been a simple and efficient one. The "Harbours" of the 6th instant reports the sale of these unfortunate into Turkish slavery. Let whatever good faith or feeling Don Mahomed may possess, be appealed to; and a liberal sum (300 Roppees or more) be offered for every sepoy and soldier who is freed. Government ought to bear this; if not, the Afghan fund—it is probably the only means now left of raising them. And as their value to the Afghans is small, it might yet avail. The Dost at least would treat us for payment, and be perhaps disposed to listen to us; at all events something should be offered, and the unhappy creatures not given up untried to their fate; hoping you will advocate their cause in your able columns.

HICKLINGHAM.

THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM-FACILITY COMPANY.—The half-yearly general meeting of the above company was held on the 20th ult., when the fourth report from the Court of Directors to the proprietors was read by the chairman, Sir John Campbell, Bt. Kt. H. W. W. of some private view from doing more than briefly noticing some of the leading points of the statement, which is only a few lines. The Company have two efficient steam-boats on the Nile, and two iron hoppers—boats and two packet-boats on the Mediterranean Coast; these means are sufficient for the regular navigation through Egypt, a distance of 180 miles—from Alexandria to Cairo. From the latter place to Suez, across the Desert (eighty-four miles), the directors make the connection in a most convenient as it ought ever to have been, and that if they continue to find it impracticable to procure the facilities for the public which they have a right to expect from the parties who have hitherto been connected with this branch of the company on fair terms, they will no longer hesitate to put into operation the Egyptian Oriental Transit Company, which will necessarily place the whole transit through Egypt on a more improved and efficient footing. Every facility has been given to the company by his highness the Pasha, who has granted farms for navigable boats on the Nile and the canal by steam; he has also established telegraphs across the Desert, and is now taking measures to erect a canal depth at Alexandria, and a large hotel at Suez, at the expense of the Egyptian government. The surplus profits of the company on the 30th Sept. last amounted to 24,539l. 15s. 4d., after paying 12,333l. 6s. 8d. as premiums for insuring their vessels (the amount insured for is £10,000). The reserved fund for contingencies against loss by the damage or deterioration of the property is 21,500l. The expense hitherto incurred by wear and tear of the shipping has been made good and paid out of the profits sold on the 17th of September. Of the 11,493 shares issued, 1,085 were taken in Calcutta; 1,022 in Madras, and the remainder in Great Britain. The dividends for the year are 32,333l., leaving instalments not yet called for of 141,821, which is stated to be fully sufficient for the existing engagements of the company. A dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum was declared, and the proprietors seemed highly satisfied with the report.

ALICE.

COAL-MINE AT SUZ.—It is said that a valuable coal-mine has been discovered at Suz. If true, this is very important to the Egyptian shippers, as coal there now costs 4d. 10s. per ton.—Id.

SUGAR MAKING IN JAMAICA.—The Jamaica planters, we observe, are beginning to seek after improved modes of cultivating their great staple crop. At a meeting of the St. Thomas in the Vale Agricultural Society, held on the 17th of September, a resolution was adopted, offering a prize "to the owner, attorney, or proprietor, who shall make the greatest quantity of sugar from a given quantity of cane." The prize to be a silver vase "value thirty guineas, to be competed for on the 1st of November, 1864." The gentleman well, of course, have an eye to the quality, as well as to the quantity, and will surely manifest any attempt to raise the price by reducing reduced wages for labour.—Anti-Slavery Reporter.

THE FRUIT TRADE IS INCREASING.—The supply this year to London of oranges, it is told, will be 50,182 boxes from St. Michael's, 4,056 boxes from Fayal, 9,763 boxes from Terrene, and 41,975 chests and boxes from Lisbon, with other quantities received at the wharves, besides the present supply of lemons, nuts, grapes, &c. makes this an important branch of business. Hitherto a monopoly is said to have existed in the brokering department of this description of merchandise, which is now likely to give way under the spirit of competition introduced by some new firms who have started, and are transacting the necessary duties at rates much more reasonable than those usually charged.—Times.

PAPERMEN.—A Letter to Sir Robert Peel appeared in the Chronicle of Monday, giving an account of statistical tables, a view of the alarming increase of Pauperism, which is said to be a serious and pressing apprehension. The writer, availing himself of the Reports of the Poor-law Commissioners, has brought into comparison the same amount of the money spent by the Unions in 1837 and 1853, and the amount of the money spent in 1840 and 1841, in the maintenance and relief of Paupers; and the result of the comparison is, that, in the latter two years, the relief expended on the paupers in England, cost upwards of a million more than in the former two years. The increase of half a million each year is equivalent to seven-twenty, or 14 per cent. per annum. The average amount expended in 1837 and 1838, was 1,000,000l. per year, or up to 32 per cent. In Lincolnshire only, there is a small decrease. The counties in which the rate of increase is the lowest, are Warwickshire, Shropshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Huntingdon. The highest rate of increase is in Dorsetshire, Lancashire, Berkshire, Gloucestershire, Devonshire, Surrey, Sussex, Somerset, and Monmouthshire. The rate of increase in the agricultural counties, containing a population of about three millions and a half, is the increased amount is 870,000l.; while, in the principal manufacturing and mining counties, containing a population of about three millions, the increased amount is 150,000l.; showing that the agricultural counties, with some exceptions, have far surpassed the manufacturing counties in the increase of their expenditure on the poor.

By another series of Tables, it is shown, that the amount and ratio of the increase of paupers have corresponded to the increase of population. The number receiving relief, in England and Wales, in the quarter ending Lady-day, 1840, was, 1,190,329; and in the same quarter of 1841, 1,200,926; showing an increase of eight hundred and twenty-seven persons of paupers to the population ratio of 1 in 20 in Derbyshire, to 1 in 7 in Buckinghamshire, Dorsetshire, Essex, Sussex, and Wiltshire. A decrease of pauperism, in 1841, appears to have taken place in Lancashire; viz. Cheshire, Cumberland, Devonshire, Nottinghamshire, and Southampton. Yet, in Devonshire, 1 in 10, and in Hampshire 1 in 9, are paupers. And, on comparing the year, in which agriculture with twelve manufacturing counties, it appears, that, while the latter have increased their paupers 11,630, the former have increased nearly threefold that amount; viz. 35,262. While the average of paupers to the population, in the one case, is 1 in 13, in the other, it is 1 in 8. It further appears, that the increase of able-bodied paupers is nearly equal to that of all other classes. In the county of Essex, the able-bodied paupers have increased nearly 3,000 in one year, or 23 per cent. Middlesex has increased its able-bodied paupers from 15,300, in 1840, to 36,123, in 1841; and the increase on all descriptions of paupers has been 50 per cent. And, on comparing, as before, the agricultural and manufacturing districts, the astounding result is elicited, that, in a period of high prices of corn and cattle, the adult able-bodied paupers have increased twofold more in the former than in the latter counties.

In conclusion, the Writer observes:—
“The actual number of paupers forms one great gauge of the vast extent of poverty which pervades the land, and which is far more extended and prevalent than is generally supposed. There is in a large proportion of our population a spirit of independence, unshackled by almost insupportable privations, which refuse to become suppliant on the will of the relieving-officer, and submit to starvation and to gradual death, rather than be branded pauper. If nearly 30,000 individuals, able-bodied adults, have been added in one year to the list of dependants on the bounties of parish charity, how imperfect must all imagined estimates be of the wretchedness in which hundreds of thousands have submitted, in order to maintain their independence! And it is for this suffering and degrading class that the Legislature should exhaust his resourceful measures, rather than allow the honest artisan to perish in uncomplaining want.”

“These Tables do not show the evil in its full extent. They carry the scene no further than the middle of 1841. The Poor-law returns up to March 1842, will furnish details more black and alarming than any this paper contains. Visit the houses of our peasantry, and the dwindling stores of our lesser shopkeepers; count the wretched dwellings and the crowded cellars and attics; examine the furniture, or rather the lack of it, of clothes, and of bedding; and you will find that everything bears out the fearful truths which these Tables so plainly indicate.”

“The evil is not yet at its full. It is not yet sufficient, that in some parts out of seven of our people are paupers; that the expense of maintaining them has increased 30 per cent.; that our adult paupers have increased one-third, two-fifths, say, even, in one case, two-thirds in one year. Such increasing year has aggravated this history of destitution, and, if Providence interpose not, a cry of universal pauperism will fill the land.”—Pat.

HANNOVER.—The Municipality of Hannover went to King Ernest with a congratulation on his son's marriage, together with the opportunity of giving up his prosecution of the City Magistracy. King Ernest bade the worthy citizens go to about their business, and not to trouble him a fourth time on the subject.

PRUSSIA.—The Prussian State Gazette publishes an edictum regarding the mode of deliberation in the commission of the States. The following are the rules or articles:

- “Art. 1. The chief of the department or the province, where the object of the deliberation arises, must conduct the deliberation as royal commission. He is supported in his function by a marshal, chosen from the members by the King.
- “Art. 2. The King will also choose the secretaries.
- “Art. 3. All communications to the commission come from the Government through the Home Ministry. The article mentions that the commission may be convened by the King.
- “Art. 4. The Minister arranges the order of deliberation, if more than one proposition be presented.
- “Art. 5. The members for each province will sit in a class.
- “Art. 6. A member on each question shall be presented to each member previous to discussion, and the project of the law, if such other be proposed.
- “Art. 7. The deliberation opens by a statement, which the chiefs of departments get prepared, containing general considerations. But explanations may be joined to the considerations.

“Art. 8. Members are called on alphabetically to give their opinions. Each can speak but once, and on the question only; when he will be called to order by the Marshal. But the chiefs of departments can speak as often as they please.

“Art. 9. Orders can only address the chief of department, and the person that the latter speaks for.

“Art. 10. A chief of department is judge of whether a summary of the discussion need be taken or not.

“Art. 11. There are times of free discussion, when each member can speak as often as he pleases; and the Marshal points out who shall speak when there have been no interruptions of opinion.

“Art. 12. The Marshal closes the debate, when no one demands to speak. He may also close the discussion, unless three members should demand a vote as to the continuance or suspension of the debate.

“Art. 13. After the debate, the chief of department puts the vote, and states it.

“Art. 14. No vote is necessary, when there have been no interruptions of opinion.

“Art. 15. Votes are to be given alphabetically, but different letters beginning with different tones, in rotation.

“Art. 16. A summary of the deliberations and the results will be drawn up. This summary is to contain, besides the statement of the discussion, 1. An account of the different opinions (without entering into the details of the arguments of the several members); as well as observations made by the head of the department, or by the chaplain present, either to give weight to the positive errors, or the names of the persons to be inserted after the summary 2. The questions upon which the assembly shall have voted, and that in positive terms; 3. The result of the vote, and the number of errors.

“Art. 17. The summary is to be read over in the next sitting for observation and assent.

“Art. 18. The summary is to be sent to the Minister of State.

“Art. 19. The final act shall not be published; but the Home Minister closes the assembly.”

The King of Prussia has exempted from the conscription all professions of more than 20 sheets. The expected law on the press has deviated to this.

The Prussian State Gazette announces, that the Committee of the Provincial States had resolved, by a majority of 90 voices to 6, that it would be advantageous to the country to construct railroads through the several Provinces of the kingdom.—Pat.

The Journal des Debats states that, according to official returns made to Government on the 1st instant, the population of the kingdom of France amounts to 34,494,875 inhabitants, divided amongst 363 arrondissements, 2,846 communes, and 37,040 communes.—Id.

INSTRUCTION OF BARCELONA, AND SCUDON SUPERVISOR OF THE CORTEA.—The news from Spain during the week has been looked to with intense anxiety. The rising of new towns and cities to join the revolutionary movement at Barcelona has been much talked of, and two regiments were said to have revolted in Aragon. At Barcelona the foreign consuls have interfered to prevent a threatened bombardment of that place by the Queen's troops. The streets were barricaded by the insurgents. Upwards of 500 soldiers have been killed, and the popular cause has lost great numbers of partisans by death. The junta has taken measures to preserve order. It is the 20th battalion of Barcelona National Guards that has suffered most from the firing of the troops.

The Regent at once decided on visiting the scene of action, and the senate voted an address of condolence. The deputies were shuffling and irresolute, before the Regent left Madrid he covered all the National Guards and addressed them for twenty minutes. The air was rent with “Viva!”

Letters from the Catalonian frontier state that Figueras, so far from having declared in favour of the cause of Barcelona was organizing a force on the 24th, to be sent in pursuit of the band of Terradas. This band is but a small one, although it has done much mischief in the way of stopping commerce, mail, &c. Girona, and the other towns, which were on the route, are supposed to join the movement, returned to their allegiance on the 24th ultimo.

The 23d of November the Regent was at Castellon, where he was well received.

On the 27th a decree of the Regent was read by the Minister of Marine, directing that the sessions of the Cortes be temporarily suspended at this time. This measure was sent to the Chamber to prevent the continuation of the most stormy and violent debates, on a vote of confidence on the Regent, proposed by the Ount de Las Navas.

The Regent was to be crowned for making his journey in the provinces; but the vote and the whole proceedings were quenched by this energetic step of Separates. It is thought that the present Cortes will not meet, but will be by the Regent on the return of the Regent. Generala Seneca and Bermejo left for Barcelona on the 24th—the first, it was expected, to succeed General Van Halen, in the command of the army.

A violent attack on the Regent, and on Separates, charging the latter with making a British colony of Spain, has been industriously circulated in Barcelona. It was also reported that British ships of war were to leave Gibraltar for Barcelona, and aid the Spanish cause. The junta has issued a proclamation to the army inviting it to join the popular cause.

A movement of an insurrectionary character broke out in Valencia on the 20th, but it was put down the next day. All these movements are decidedly republican.

There are 37,000 troops assembled in Catalonia, fully prepared to treat Barcelona as a city occupied by a hostile army, should it not submit to the most unqualified submission. Separates is also more decided. His whole conduct has been very energetic, but he has been opposed in the lower house of the Cortes by unbridled passions, raucous accusations, and even court menaces.

It was reported at Madrid that the Infante Don Francisco de Paula had been proclaimed Regent in Aragon—but this is incorrect. The Regent was accompanied in his journey by 14,000 troops.

Although it is undoubtedly very difficult to predict what events may occur in Spain, yet the present insurrection looks like a failure, and if so, the power of Separates will be at its much increased.

A movement at Lerida was reported, but the result is not confirmed.—Atlas.

LATVY NEWS FROM SPAIN.—The Captain-General of Latvia has been ordered to the insurgents at Barcelona that the Government would begin on the morning of the 28th ult. The insurgents were disposed to yield. The Regent arrived at Barcelona on the 24th, was received with enthusiasm, and was still there on the 26th. The port of Barcelona and the neighbouring coast were declared in a state of blockade. Madrid was tranquil on the 28th.—Id.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—The question of the Slave-trade having been so often a topic of discussion, it may not be disagreeable to your readers to know something of the enormous profit made by West Indian and North American slave-dealers; I shall, therefore, bend you, for publication, a letter addressed to me when I was in America, in 1841, promising me to take a share in a speculation of the kind.

The original was written in French, and was addressed to me by Captain Auguste L., one of the most notorious slave-dealers, and was delivered to me by his own hand.

The calculations of Captain L., which I will set out, are quite accurate as far as I can see; still I have not them at my ear, a newly translated, without altering any part of the original.

REVIVAL OF THE LANDHOLDERS' SOCIETY.—Some time back we stated that the Landholder's Society had apparently become extinct. For more than a twelvemonth it had given no signs of existence, and we naturally applied to it the old legal maxim de non apparentibus et non existentiis eadem est ratio. A letter which appeared last week in the papers, with the signature of the Secretary attached to it, however, convinces us that the announcement of its death was premature. It has only been in a state of somnolency. If we are not mistaken it is the arrival of Mr. George Thompson which has broken its long sleep. At one of the meetings at which he has addressed the Natives of Calcutta upon their own interests, he alluded to the apathy which the Native community manifested in regard to the legislative movements of Government, in the following terms. "You see, week after week, announcements of proposed changes, and new laws, and new systems. You offer no advice, you threaten no opposition, you recommend no modification. What is everybody's business is nobody's business; and the law is passed, or it is not passed, according to the sole will and pleasure, or views of the Government. May not the Government justly say afterwards, that you are yourselves to blame in the matter, if any injury is done, or any benefit withheld?" These remarks appear to have roused the dormant faculties of the Landholders' Society, and it now comes forward again to assure the public of its existence.

The occasion which has been selected to prove that the Society is not defunct, tells heavily against its utility. During the long slumber in which it has been indulging, the subject of a general Registration of all deeds throughout the three Presidencies, upon a uniform and a reformed system, has engaged the attention of the Government and the European community. The draft of an Act, formed upon the model of similar Acts in England, was published both in English and Bengalee, twenty-two months ago. It was manifestly drawn up with the greatest care and attention, and was intended to give this country the benefit of those improvements which had been gradually introduced into the system of Registration at home. It was fully canvassed in the European journals, not only by the Editors, but by many of their correspondents who had the benefit of local experience. The draft was remodelled and republished thirteen months ago; but Lord Ellenborough on his arrival, appeared to be averse to its being passed, chiefly we believe because his Lordship's attention was too much engrossed in giving peace to Asia to allow him leisure for mastering its complicated details. A simpler enactment was therefore substituted for it, with the view of rendering the existing rules more effective. The draft of this Act was published four months ago; and the Act itself was enacted on the 1st of the present month. During the whole period in which these two Acts were under consideration, the Landholders' Society remained, as far as we can judge from their silence, totally inactive. A fortnight after the law had passed, the Secretary of that Association calls the special attention of the members to it; and announces that the Society have it "in contemplation to address the Government in reference to the existing laws of Registration, with the object of promoting the greater efficiency and completeness of the system." Why was not this done while the subject was on the tapis? Why was it delayed till the Act in reference to Registration was actually passed? Simply because Mr. George Thompson upbraided the Natives with their inactivity, when Government invited their opinions regarding the laws which it was proposed to enact. Mr. Thompson's visit will therefore be doubly beneficial; beneficial to himself, in showing him the extent to which the via tertia pervades the Native community; and advantageous to the Natives by rousing them from their torpority; and teaching them that something more is required of them than to denounce the Government under which they live.

The subject of Registration will of course come on again as soon as the Government shall have leisure for internal improvements. The question is one of paramount importance both as it regards the security of property, and the due administration of justice, and Government will require all the assistance which it is possible for the community, European or Native, to contribute. The registration, must be made compulsory, or it will fail to be a complete check on fraud. The Scotch law must be our model, and the utility of a document must date from its registration, not its execution. There may be some little inconvenience produced by so compulsory a law among so dilatory and so slippery a people; but it will infinitely less than the inconvenience which will inevitably result from leaving even the smallest loop hole by which a man can escape from Registration. And, moreover, it is only by suffering that the national vice of procrastination can be cured. To make this compulsory law equitable, however, we shall require such a system of local registration as may give every man an opportunity of registering his documents, without the necessity of a journey of four or five days to the chief station in the district. We shall require also such a system of supervision as shall effectually prevent a scribe being kept a week darning attendance at the Registry office, harpington for the registration of his deed with the verbal Native officer.—But this is not the time for entering upon this large subject; our chief object at present is to congratulate the Landholder's Society upon the symptoms of re-asserting vitality which it has begun to exhibit.

THE COLLEGE OF FORT WILLIAM.—The last number of the Calcutta Gazette contains the report of the College of Fort William for the past year, and the observations of the Deputy Governor upon the progress made by the students. Those observations are marked by a sound judgment and a benevolent regard for the welfare of the people. His Honor reminds the students that "they are destined to be the future administrators of this great and populous country; disinterested men from College and planted there upon the qualifications they are found to possess, will depend the happiness of the people committed to their charge; that to possess a competent knowledge of the language which the people all speak and in which alone public proceedings are conducted, is so essential, that to be unable to communicate with the highest and the lowest without the aid of an interpreter, would be considered a disqualification—and that the languages of the people ought to be the first study of those who are entrusted with the public administration, and to whom the people have to look up on all occasions for protection against oppression and injustice." These are noble sentiments and manifest a just appreciation of the responsibility of Government. Let us now examine how far the studies of the College, during the past year, have corresponded with them.

This Presidency is divided into two parts; the North Western Provinces, and Bengal; the former are said to contain fifty millions of people; among whom the official language is Oorissa; the latter is supposed to comprise thirty millions of people who understand no language but Bengalee, in which all public proceedings are conducted. The number of Civilian employed in the civil and criminal courts and the revenue department in the provinces in which Oorissa prevails, is about Two Hundred; the number now stationed in the districts in which Bengalee is the only language in use, is about One Hundred and Thirteen. On turning to the report, we find registration, must be made compulsory, or it that during the past year only five solitary Civilian passed an examination in Bengalee; all the rest were reported qualified in two languages, neither of which was Bengalee, but one of which was the exploded Persian. It is therefore manifest, that only one student during the last year was qualified for office in Bengal, and that another student of the year who may be appointed to any office in the Lower Provinces, must enter upon his public career disqualified for the discharge of his duties. Against the continuance of such a course of instruction we must venture to offer three objections:

1. It is in direct contravention of the published orders of the Court of Directors. Those orders are positive, "We desire that it may be held down and promulgated as a standing rule, that no member of our service shall hold the appointment of Judge, or of Collector, or of Magistrate in any district with the language of which he is unacquainted." Yet while this order remains unrevoked, it was not deemed necessary to the quality more than our Civilian out of fifteen, during the past year for the public service in the populous kingdom of Bengal. If it be said, that the orders of the Court refer only to Judges, Collectors and Magistrates, and that for many years the young Civilian will be employed only in subordinate situations, we plead that the spirit, not the letter, of the despatch is to be the guide of the public authorities. We will venture to assert that it never could have been the intent of the Directors that the vast public interests entrusted to Joint Magistrates, Deputy Collectors, and Assistants, should be superintended by men entirely ignorant of the language of the people. But after having disinterested men from College and planted them in the public service, without any knowledge of the language current in the subordinate Courts in which they are to preside, what arrangements have been made for ascertaining that at any future period they have acquired this es-mental qualification before they rise to the higher dignities of Judge, Magistrate and Collector? None whatever. There is no subsequent examination, by which their acquaintance with this vernacular tongue is ascertained. There is no indentured held out to them to acquire it; neither is there any penalty attached to their ignorance of it. They obtain appointments without any reference to this qualification. And there is every reason to fear that they will never acquire it. When men fail to obtain a colloquial familiarity with a language within the first two or three years after their arrival in the country, in nine instances out of ten they will not acquire it at all.

2. This course of procedure is liable to the charge of inconsistency, and exposes the public authorities to the ridicule of mankind. Where is the consistency of obliging every student in the College to pass an examination in Persian, after that language has been excluded from all the public Courts? If the subject was not too aversive for a laugh, the idea of extolling men for the acquisition of a language, the use of which has been abandoned, would recall the witty line in the Rejected Addresses:

"God bless their pigtail, though they're now cut off."

This pigtail, the badge of Mahomedan domination, we have by a public enactment cut off; and it is therefore inconsistent to extol men for wearing it.

Where is the consistency of declaring a knowledge of the vernacular language indispensable to a due discharge of public duty, and of allowing fourteen out of fifteen men to leave College unqualified for service in Bengal? After Bengalee has become by public appointment the language of public business among thirty millions of people, is it not a strange anomaly that it should be far less studied by those who are to preside over the administration of public business among them, than when it was not the official language? Is it not the dictate of consistency and of common sense that, if the students are required to qualify themselves in two languages before they enter on the public service, these should be the two languages which are current in the two divisions of the Presidency, and no other?

3. This course is also unjust to the people of Bengal. It is of the last importance that the Civilian who is to be employed in this province, should be well acquainted with its language. We venture to say that not one-fourth of the Civilian now employed in it, have any thing like a competent knowledge of its language. This is more their misfortune than their fault. Their education was completed, while Bengalee was yet proscribed; and they have been accustomed during their official career to Persian and Oordoo. But there can be no excuse for sending a single individual from the College of Fort William, to take charge of a public office in Bengal who is not acquainted with that language. Without it, he becomes immediately, as the Deputy Governor admirably remarks, the "instrument of fraud and chicanery." He is totally unable to protect the people committed to his charge. The distance by which his European habits and his official character separate him from the people, is indefinitely increased by his ignorance of their language. In vain does Government laboriously and conscientiously devise means for improving the administration of justice, and watch with vigilance over the conduct of its servants, European and Native, if the European functionaries are allowed to preside in Courts totally ignorant of the language of the people. Even when possessed of the most intimate knowledge of that language, the European officer finds it difficult to do justice between man and man; what then must be the amount of injustice perpetrated in his name when that knowledge is entirely wanting?

We are not certain that though the system which we have adverted on has been pursued in the College during the past year, it may not have already received its death blow. We have heard that an improvement has been already made in the studies of the young Civilian; and that greater importance will be attached in future to the cultivation of Bengalee, and less to that of Persian. We consider it a matter of justice to make this statement, lest it should be supposed, when the change is announced, that it has been owing to the impetuosity of the press and not to the spontaneous impulse of the public authorities. Perhaps when the improvement is announced, it may encounter opposition from antiquated prejudice; and our labour in thus pointing out the impropriety of the present course will not then have been lost. The fact is, the whole system of study in this Institution requires to be radically remodelled. It is a great misfortune that no change has been made to accommodate it to the altered circumstances of the country, and that its arrangements are the same as they were eight years ago, when Persian was the language of business, and Bengalee was not. We require not only that the Bengalee language should be cultivated to the extent to which it will be required in the public service; but that a considerable modification should be made to improve the qualifications of those students whose sphere of action will hereafter lie in the North West Provinces. The official language in those Courts is the Oordoo, which is not at all studied in the College. It is true that Persian bears a very close affinity to Oordoo, and that the student who has acquired a knowledge of the one, will find little difficulty in mastering the other. But why should he not be directed at once to apply to Oordoo, instead of being set to acquire it through the medium of Persian? Why should he form any part of his qualification, when it is used in no Court? We would not advise; we would presumptuously command that every student should devote his time to the study of Oordoo and Bengalee, and thus qualify himself for the discharge of public duty in every district of this Presidency. We look with confidence to the efforts of Mr. Bird before he bids adieu to the country to complete the improvement introduced under Lord Auckland's administration, by a thorough reformation of the system of study in the College of Fort William. This must be done in conjunction with the Court of Directors. To effect this salutary change, it is necessary to begin with the studies at Haylesbury; and to direct the exertions of the student, from the very beginning, to those languages which shall qualify him for public duty. But the impulse must originate in this country.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S NEW APPOINTMENTS.—Our readers can scarcely have failed to remark the number of direct, substantive appointments in the Civil branch of the Service which Lord Ellenborough has made since he assumed charge of the administration in the North Western Provinces. One Gazette, that of the 8th, contained no fewer than twenty-one appointments, of which only two were of a temporary nature. A careful examination of the character they bear, will perhaps furnish us with some clue to the principle on which his Lordship seems resolved to act in reference to Civil offices. We find that each district is supplied with a substantive Civil Judge, a Magistrate and Collector, a Joint Magistrate and Deputy Collector, and one or more Assistants. His Lordship is evidently averse to the system of allowing a man to stand appointed to an office, while he is acting elsewhere, and his own duties are performed by another. Apparently, every individual will be required to join his office as soon as he has been posted to it, and will not be allowed to draw the salary without performing the duty. The appointment of three or four officers in regular subordination, to the Magistrate and Fiscal duties of a district, will also, enable Government to provide for the temporary absence of any one of them, without creating a series of officiating officers,—by simply directing the juniors to act for their seniors. This will serve to correct to a considerable degree the great inconvenience which results from acting appointments; for it sometimes happens that the departure of one individual occasions the shifting of five or six others in different and distant parts of the country. Thus the service appears to be perpetually on the move; and the country is deprived of those advantages which can be secured only by giving a more permanent character to the possession of office, and thereby enabling an officer to become acquainted with his district. When the means of supplying a vacancy are at hand in the district itself, the inconveniences of change will be less felt.

This plan has yet to be tested by experience. It remains to be seen how far it will provide for those mutations which inevitably result from the loss of health. To all appearance it is likely to accomplish the object for which it is evidently designed; and if it should succeed, it will serve as a model for the lower Provinces, where the evils of officiating appointments, and the constant change of officers tell so much against the efficiency of the Service. May we be allowed to suggest the propriety of erecting bungalows, in central positions in each district at a moderate expense, to which the young Assistants might be sent periodically, for the purpose of administering justice on the spot. Nothing acts so effectually as a check on the oppression of a Native officer as the presence of a European functionary in his vicinity. The tour made by the Magistrate through his district during the cold season, is a great blessing; but we want something of the same nature during every month of the year. The establishment of such bungalows would enable the junior officers to visit the various portions of the district, at short intervals, without inconvenience. This would not only serve to bring justice in a measure to every man's door, to inspire the natives with confidence, and to infuse a salutary terror into the minds of their oppressors, but give our European functionaries such a knowledge of the interior of the country as they have at present no means of obtaining. If the position of these bungalows be judiciously chosen, it is possible that they may hereafter become the station of fixed officers with subordinate police jurisdiction. It is not merely the multiplication, but the diffusion of European influence that we require, to afford adequate protection to the people.

MR THOMPSON'S ADDRESSES TO THE NATIVES.—Since Mr. George Thompson's arrival in Calcutta, he has been employed not only in prosecuting enquiries for his personal information, but in striving to arouse the natives to a course of patriotic exertion. He has held several meetings, which have been attended by a large and increasing number of the best educated men in Calcutta, to whom he has pointed out the course they must pursue if they would benefit their country. It is gratifying to find so large a body of natives capable of appreciating the eloquent appeals of a man like George Thompson. We can well remember the time, when, if he had landed in India, not five natives would have been found in Calcutta, able to comprehend a single sentence delivered by him. Accustomed as we are to periodical reports of education, we become in a measure insensible of the progress of improvement effected by the labours of Government and of private associations, till it is suddenly presented to the mind by some unexpected association like the present, when we find hundreds of educated natives listening with admiration to that eloquence which has produced so powerful an effect in our native land.

The addresses which Mr. Thompson has delivered at these meetings, appear to be eminently calculated to improve the native community, and to give a beneficial direction to their efforts. He seems to be already at home with the native character. He has measured the extent of its weakness, and his discourses are therefore characterized by a very practical tendency. When he advises them to study their own country, its past history, its present state, its various institutions, and their influence on the national character, and affirms that without this knowledge their efforts will be powerless, he shows at once that he has discovered wherein the deficiency of his audience lies. There are few subjects of which the educated natives are more lamentably ignorant than of those which refer to the actual condition of their own native land. They have in fact scarcely any knowledge of it beyond what has been forced on them by daily observation, or which can be said to owe its origin to their own researches. When he counsels union, he is addressing a people among whom discord is the only hell, and jealousy of each other the feeling which perpetuates every mark of society. When he advises them to move forward as a "compact whole," he is appealing to those whose ancestors have invariably allowed private interests to swallow up all concern for the general good, whose independence has repeatedly been lost, while they were engaged in petty idleness; and among whom a compact union, founded on much mutual forbearance, and great national principles, appears at present all but impossible.

In the course of his address, Mr. Thompson stated that "England was the fountain head from which benefits must flow to India;—and that great measures in behalf of India must originate in England." This may possibly be true as it regards the future, but the past history of India would scarcely warrant any such expectation. For many years after this empire had been subjected to the crown of Britain, it was governed with a view to the promotion of British and not Indian interests. Till within a very recent period, the commercial legislation of Parliament was stimulated by a desire to promote the welfare of the mother country, without any thought of the consequences entailed by such a course on India. Under the influence of this partial system of Government, the resources of this vast country have been neglected and its prospects blighted. A brighter period however has now dawned on us; and we hear even within the walls of Parliament of Justice to India. But this improvement of public feeling is still to be attributed mainly, though not entirely, to a calculation of the benefits which may accrue to England by an improved system of administration. We have gained nothing by any sacrifice of interests, or even prejudices, at home. It is chiefly because the other nations of Europe are closing their markets against our manufactures, that England has turned her attention to the large and kind of the Tugores, when it resolved to punish her for produce which India presents, and which can be turned to account only by a liberal system of policy.

And, with reference to those measures of internal policy by which the domestic administration of the country has been improved of late years, we have no hesitation in saying that there is scarcely a single instance in which any improvement can be traced to the direct intervention of the Home authorities. Some of those measures, as for instance, the Liberty of the Press and the abolition of the transit duties, have been carried in a great measure against the wishes of the Court of Directors. It was long before they could be prevailed on to sanction the establishment of a monthly steam communication with India. On more than one occasion, Lord William Bentinck was sharply censured for having sent the High Lander up the Red Sea with public despatches. We acknowledge with gratitude that the Directors have long since retrieved their character, and are now as warm advocates for this intercourse by steam as they were once opposed to it;—but the impulse was given from this country. It used indeed to be a common remark not many years ago, that if India was well governed, it was in spite of the Government at home. Without subscribing to this assertion in its fullest extent, we may yet remark with perfect confidence, that, with few exceptions, every great and beneficial measure has originated on this side the water, and that the public authorities in India here have generally been found ahead of the home authorities in their liberal views. The impulse which was given originally to native education, arose from the enlightened sentiments of Lord Hastings, who long before the Directors had abandoned India, long before the Directors had abandoned the principle that ignorance was the mother of obedience. The abolition of Sutees was the work of Lord William Bentinck. To the same great mind do we owe the introduction of Natives into the administration of the country which has given so vast an impulse to native improvement. To this bold policy we are indebted for the settlement of the Western Provinces. It is to Lord Auckland that we owe that magnificent boon, and the restoration of the vernacular languages to the Courts at this Presidency; and it was through his recommendation that an addition was made to the funds of the Education Society. To the energetic and persevering efforts of Mr. Bird are we indebted for the abolition of Slavery in India. In all these instances—and they might be multiplied,—it is in India and not in England that the fountain head of benefit in India has been opened. To the Government here belongs the merit of having taken the lead in this career of national benevolence; to the Government at home that of having honoured these efforts by its sanction. Far be it from us to undervalue the importance of bringing the moral influence of England to bear upon the Government of this country and the improvement of its inhabitants; but justice demands that the due meed of praise for having originated good measures should not be withheld from those great men who have presided over the administration of this country.

EXPULSION OF DWARKENATH TAGORE FROM SOCIETY.—The Blinker, the ablest Native Journal published in Calcutta, informs us that a large meeting was convened a few days ago at the house of Harukumar Tagore, of the whole kind and kind of the Tugores, when it resolved to punish Dwarkanath Tagore for having visited Europe, by turning him out of society. The individuals from whom he has received this unkind and ungenerous cut are his own relatives, who have generally been supposed to belong to the liberal party in Calcutta. All family intercourse is to cease; he is not to be admitted to their domestic parties; neither will they or their friends accept of any invitation to his house. The non-intercourse act was, we farther learn, put in force soon after the meeting. The anniversary shradhu of Dwarkanath Tagore's wife came round, and the usual invitations were sent, but universally refused. Thus the individual upon whom the highest distinction has been conferred by the rulers of this Empire which has ever been bestowed on any Native, is secluded from all social intercourse with his own kindred, and tabooed by the members of his own house. The individual, whom the Queen of England and the King of France have delighted to honour, is proscribed in his own country and among his own people. Instead of considering the family honour augmented in the person of its illustrious head, his bigoted kindred have made the very marks of distinction which he has received from crowned heads the reason for visiting him with their highest displeasure. He is not without honour, save in his own country.

If the members of the Tagore family, who have thus exposed the nakedness of their bigotry to the contempt of mankind, were men of unblemished purity in their own circle, if they had not violated the rules of their own shastras, there might have been some small excuse for this conduct. We might have admired that high sense of religious duty, which constrained them to adopt the painful resolution of excluding so distinguished a member of the family from their society. But there is not one of them whose conduct will stand the test of the most ordinary scrutiny. They have long ceased to honour by their observance the rigid rules of the Hindoo creed. They have themselves sown seeds which it is forbidden to eat; they have drank that which it is forbidden to drink. In their own social intercourse they have been governed by their own love of indulgence, and not by the laws of the Hindoo ritual. Their bigotry is marked with the deeper stain of hypocrisy. They are fully aware that Dwarkanath has for many years disregarded all the restrictions of Hindooism; that he has freely entered into the enjoyment of European society; and that on the principle they now make a show of honoring, he was unfit for their society long before he embarked for England. Yet they urged in objection to the mere unwarranted intercourse with him. They did not drink at his table; they attended the pujas given at his house; they accepted invitations to the shradhu he performed. Yet, because he has now ventured to visit the countries of Europe, to enlarge the sphere of his observations, and see with his own eyes the triumphs of civilisation, he is, forthwith, because too polluted for their immaculate society.

INFIDELITY OF THE POST OFFICE.—During the last two or three months we have received repeated remonstrances relative to the non receipt of the copies of the Friend of India sent to England by the overland mail. To mention only one instance. Not a single copy of the Journal sent to Sir Edward Ryan, since his arrival in England, has ever reached him. We have assured our friends that the papers have been regularly despatched and paid for, and acknowledged by the Post Office in Calcutta. On applying to that department, we have been informed that a reference to the office records will prove, that in every instance they have been transmitted to Bombay. The charge of neglect therefore lies at the door either of the Bombay or the London Post Office. At first we supposed that this infidelity of the Post Office might have been confined to the despatch of our Journal, but within the last week we have found other parties who had sent home other Journals make the same complaint. The copies they had transmitted never reached their destination. It is a subject of great importance to the public. We pay largely for the postage of our newspapers to Bombay, not less than three annas a cover, and we have a right to expect that those papers shall not be withheld from those to whom they are addressed. We have a right to know where this dereliction of duty occurs. If the papers are faithfully made up into packets at Bombay and committed to the Captains of Steamers,—and we have every reason to believe that this is the case,—if a statement of the number and contents of each packet is sent to the London Post Office and compared with the deliveries, this neglect is clearly chargeable on the Post Office authorities in England; and it behoves this Government to make a representation on the subject to the proper authorities. Perhaps our Bombay contemporary of the Times will kindly inform us whether any such complaints have reached him regarding the non-delivery of the two or three thousand summaries which he sends home.—Meanwhile we beg to assure all our friends who have honoured us by ordering this Journal to be sent to their friends at home, that their wishes have in every instance been punctually attended to; and that we hold Post Office receipts for every copy which has been sent.

SHAMAN'S FRIEND SOCIETY.—We have been favored with the Fifteenth Report of this useful Institution, the object of which is to impart religious instruction to the numerous seamen in the Port. The means adopted for this end consist of staffed services at the Bethel, or Floating Chapel, personal visits to the ships in the river, and conversation with the Sailors; the circulation of loan libraries, and the distribution of Bibles and Tracts. Mr. Chill, the agent of the Society has, it appears, faithfully prosecuted his arduous but too often unthankful duty, and during the last year visited 278 vessels, conversed with upwards of 3000 individuals, distributed 2300 English and Foreign Tracts, 93 English Bibles, 41 English, 9 French, 5 German, 1 Spanish, 1 Italian, 1 Dutch, 1 Arabic New Testament. He has also put in circulation twenty loan libraries. The number of hearers at the Bethel since the last Report has been four thousand, six hundred and eleven, being an increase of one-third on the attendance of former years. The services on the Sabbath are conducted in turn by the Ministers of various denominations in Calcutta, and on Wednesday evening by Mr. Chill. The number of libraries in circulation at the present time is 27, and they comprise 860 volumes. Of these, eight have been placed on private vessels, and the remainder in vessels belonging to Government. The books ready for new libraries amount to 460; but the means of the Society in this department of labour are evidently far below, both their wishes, and the wants of the port. Mr. Chill, the agent, has also at the request of the Committee established a daily morning service at the Sailor's Home, but attendance has been very discouraging; the highest number present on any occasion was twelve, but frequently not more than three attended, and on some occasions not a single individual. The subscriptions to the Institution during the eighteen months embraced by the Report, was a little above 3000 Rupees; its expenditure, 3320 Rupees, leaving a balance against it of nearly 500 Rupees, for which the Society are suitors to public generosity.

The sphere of labour which belongs to such an Institution, is large and important. The number of English vessels which resort to this port, has been doubled within the last eight or ten years; the number of sailors who stand in need of that religious instruction which is the most effectual check on the excesses into which they plunge on being released from the restraints of a ship, has also been doubled since this Society was first established. Yet its means and opportunities are without increase, and its success is very disproportioned. By no class of men is the British and the Christian character more exposed to the contempt of the heathen than by the sailors in Calcutta. The most strenuous efforts are therefore needed, not merely with a view to their individual benefit, but for the common honour of religion. The Society we perceive have contemplated the establishment of a Naval Temperance Institution, the object of which is to board the officers and seamen in this port in an establishment from which liquor should be excluded. We scarcely think the plan, however benevolent, is likely to succeed. The funds required for its establishment and maintenance would be very large, more indeed than the members of the Society could expect to command, while another Institution existed in the city, differing in no respect from the proposed one, except by the admission and temperate use of ardent spirits. The two Institutions would, we fear, be placed in a state of rivalry; and the weakest would go to the wall, or to the Insolvent Court. We are inclined to think that the Society would do better to confine its efforts within the present channel, and strive to enlarge its opportunities of doing good by encouraging to bring as large a number as possible of the seamen under the influence of religious instruction. The great success which has attended the labors of Mr. Taylor in Boston, among the sailors of that port, proves clearly how much may be effected by strenuous and acceptable ministrations among them.

Son Hoor Govon came up to Barnackpore on Sunday evening last, and on Monday morning reviewed the troops at the station. On coming up to the Bengal Volunteers just returned from service in China, the gallant General addressed them in the following language, which we are enabled to give from the recollection of an officer who had an opportunity of hearing him.

"Comrades in arms as brother soldiers, whose determined gallantry in the field has ably supported me, and nobly upheld the distinguished charafter of the Native army whilst under my command in China, I have been highly pleased with your orderly conduct in quarters, I have done all I could to bring you to the notice of the Sovereign of Great Britain, and I am sure the next Mail will bring an order for a remuneration of your services, and reward of your valor. Should my Sovereign call me into the field again, it would give me the highest gratification to have under my orders, either collectively or individually, any commissioned, non-commissioned officer or sepoys of the Bengal Volunteers." Then turning to Colonel Lloyd, he expressed "his sincere thanks to him for his able management of the Regiment, and to him and the officers for their support of him in every way, wishing them every happiness and success."

This address was explained to the sepoys in their own language by Col. Lloyd, the Commander of the Corps. His Excellency's address was highly gratifying to the feelings of the officers and men present, and they will long continue to remember with satisfaction, the opportunity they have enjoyed of distinguishing themselves in that novel and distant scene of operations; and the kind manner in which their services were appreciated by the General who led them on to victory.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

—The Governor General entered the city of Delhi, with military parade on the morning of Sunday, the 5th instant. He was accompanied by a large cortege of Native Chiefs; and a still greater number are on their way to the imperial city to make their obeisance to the Head of the British dynasty. The Rajah of Bharnpore also has a splendid retinue of 2000 men. The report which was spread that his Lordship intended to interfere with the King of Delhi, have died away. It is a sufficient humiliation to that family that in its own metropolis, it is eclipsed by those who now occupy the imperial throne and wield the destinies of India.

—The Star announces the arrival in the river of thirty horses in a French ship. The speculation, according to our contemporaries, has promising appearances. Good French horses may be shipped from Marseilles to the Mauritius for 300 piastres or 600 Rupees; and of course they may be brought on to Calcutta for 700 Rs.

—The Delhi Gazette gives us intelligence from Lahore to the 29th January. Dost Mahomed was still at that Court. He had expressed his desire to depart for Afghanistan, but had been courteously detained by Sher Singh. Four Regiments of Infantry had been despatched to Peshawar, to strengthen General Aivabille, and the Birdar Lasa Singh has been placed at the head of them. The bridge of boats at Ferozepore had been broken up; and orders had been issued to draw all boats at night fall to the right bank of the river. Instructions were also issued to prepare contingents for the Regiments in the immediate neighbourhood of Ferozepore.

—Mr. Cliechew, employed by the Steam Tug Association, lost his life by a melancholy accident on Monday. He was engaged in getting a boiler out of the Joss, when the tackle broke, and he fell into the boiler which was precipitated into the water. His body was subsequently found; and it appeared that he had been killed by a blow on the head.

—Mr. C. H. Cameron, a member of the Law Commission, has been called up to Court to supply the vacancy created by Mr. Amos's departure.

—We perceive that the Assam Company's Steamer, having returned to Calcutta, will be again despatched on the 28th instant. From this announcement we are led to suppose that her recent voyage has not been without profit. We wish the Secretary had furnished the public with some account of her performance on her last trip to Af-labeled and back. She had only four small cargo boats in row. What was the rate of her speed? Was it greater or less than that of the Government vessels? Eventually we must look to private enterprise for the occupation of this line of communication; and every fact which may serve to illustrate the subject will be found valuable.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

— We do not know that our contemporaries have noticed the fact, that a recent sale of American reprints of English books, which had been advertised on behalf of a mercantile firm, was stopped, in obedience to the recent Act of Parliament. The Attorney General has, we know, delivered his opinion that any such sale would subject the vendor to the penalty of the Act. It is of some importance, that this opinion should be known; and we hope our contemporaries will procure and publish it. We learn that powers of Attorney have been received from booksellers in London, empowering their representatives here, to prosecute for any breach of the law in reference to books of which they held the copyright.

— The Hindustan Standard, which left Madras on the 21st, at 9 p. m. reached Calcutta on the 24th. Her progress hitherto has been highly satisfactory; and it is every reason to hope that she will reach Suet in less than the month.

— Mr. Aylwin is delivering a series of lectures at the Mechanics' Institute on commerce. The second was delivered on Tuesday evening, to a very miserable and discouraging audience of thirty persons, which however is stated to be larger than the first audience from Allahabad, published in the Englishman, states that the crowd of pilgrims at that place at the last mela, was unusually large; and that the resort to this 'sacred' place for the purpose of bathing, has been annually increasing since the tax was abolished.

— The crowd of shipping in the river is very unusual for this season of the year. This arises from the return of the transports, in such large numbers from China. Many of them after a long service, stand in need of repairs, and all of them require examination. The owners of the decks will therefore reap as great a harvest as they did from the gale, which did no body any good but them.

— The report of fire during the past year in Calcutta is thus announced in the papers.—Pooka houses 8; Tiled houses, 528; Straw houses, 1896. From the great preponderance of straw huts it is manifest that the law passed some years ago prohibiting the use of thatch, or other combustible material, is a dead letter.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

— Some person, whose initials, read or fictitious, are J. E. R. is writing letters to Mr. George Thompson on the Government of India, and publishing them in the Herkers. The second letter, which appears this day, proposes an "slight change in the constitution." We think that a knowledge of the languages of the natives be an indispensable qualification for the Governor Generalship of India—that is a knowledge of Persian, Ooriss, Assam, Bengalee, Oriya, Burmese, Telugoo, Tamil, Canarese, Malayalam, Gujaratee, and Mahrattee—that the selection be made from among those who have served in India; that the period of service be extended to twelve years; and last, not least, that a Native be appointed Legislative member of the Supreme Council. We think we shall give our vote for that eminent patriot, Baboo Dakhina Mohookjee.

— A letter from Meerut states, that Sir W. Norb had left that station for Lucknow.

— A Agre Chhber extraordinary, which reached on yesterday afternoon, announces the death of Maha Rajah Jankoojee Rao Sandia, at the age of 27. There is little prospect that the tranquility of the state will be disturbed; but it is said that the demand will remain vacant until the pleasure of the Governor General is known. There have been no female immolations.

— The entertainment given by the community of Calcutta to Sir Hugh Gough, at the Town Hall, on Thursday night, is described by those who were present as a very interesting affair. The aristocracy of Churwinge and the aristocracy of the Costobolm, met in the same hall to do honour to the hero, who has humbled the Dragon throne, and to eat, drink and dance.

— Among the Police reports there is a case headed "Cannulidism." It appears that a Portuguese woman brought up another for having—both being the worse for liquor—bitten off a part of her ear and swallowed it. The case was dismissed by the Magistrate.

— Mr. T. G. Robertson, late Governor of Aggra, has arrived at Bombay, having gone down the Indus, and then embarked in a steamer at Karachi.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 20.

— The Sans Souci Theatre is advertised for sale by auction.

— The Madras papers state, that at the public entertainment given by the Marquis of Evesham, at the Banqueting Room, in honour of our success in China, the gentlemen of the bar were intentionally not invited;—also that no barrier has been asked to the private parties of the Governor. This is said to arise from their having omitted to attend His Lordship's first levee, and this omission is ascribed to the fact that the Court was setting at the time, and that they could not be in two places at the same time. We, of the fourth estate, are so liable to be mistaken on matters of fact, when those facts come to us at second hand, and still more so in drawing inferences, that we are disposed on this occasion, to question first the fact, and secondly the cause. A Governor would scarcely proclaim his own incompetence for the high station he occupies, by the indulgence of such narrow and contemptible feelings.

— The very important Act, relative to the sittings of the Sudder Court, of which the draft was published some months back, has just become law. The great amendment, expounded by editors, when one Judge differed from another, and a cause had to run the gauntlet, sometimes of the whole bench, will thus be avoided. When the Act was first proposed we explained the nature of the improvement, and need not therefore enlarge upon it again. It provides that in every case in which a Judge of the Sudder may differ in an appeal case from the decision of a lower Court, he shall call in two other Judges and the case shall be as once decided by the opinion of the majority.

— In consequence of the demise of the Raja of Jwalior, the Governor General has altered his plans and instead of going to Meerut, has determined to proceed forthwith to Aggra, to be near hand during the time when the question of the succession is settled. There is little difficulty and no opposition to his Lordship's wish anticipated; the latter would be promptly met and overcome, by the large force at Lord Kilmorrough's disposal.

— A very important case was tried in the Supreme Court yesterday, a report of which we have taken from the Herkers. Mr. G. F. McClintock, on going to the Cape, applied to his Agents Messrs. Boyd and Co. for a credit to the extent of 2000 £ on their London Correspondents Messrs. Small, Colquhoun and Co. which he obtained. He drew on them for this sum; and they drew for the 2000 £ on Messrs. Boyd and Co. who at the time were possessed of funds belonging to Mr. McClintock to that extent. Boyd and Co. failed, and the Mills were never paid, and the London House now commenced an action against that gentleman. A verdict was given in their favour, with liberty to the defendant to move for a verdict or to reduce the damages. It would appear from this decision, that any man taking a letter of credit from his Agents for money deposited with them is liable for the whole amount if they fail before the correspondent is adjusted between them and with their correspondent.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

— The subscription to the Greenlaw Testimonial has reached 10999 Rupees, though the number of subscribers does not exceed 84.

— Mr. Dampier, as we learn from the Star, has found that there is a disorganization in the district of Assam which is not to be attributed to an inefficient Magistrate and Police. His report is said to be very favourable to the latter. His was allowed two months to make enquiries, and two weeks have been found sufficient to complete them. He recommends the appointment of two Assistant Magistrates. We sincerely hope that the recommendation will be attended to not only in the case of this district, but of all other districts; and that when two Assistant-Magistrates are stationed in the interior; not segregated at the Sadler station—are found to be inefficient twice that number will be appointed.

— A correspondent of the Englishman on Saturday alludes to the injustice of Government "boning" the 15 per cent. paid as deposit on the sale of lands, and forfeited by the non fulfillment of the contract. Our contemporary has an odd kind of article on the subject in his paper of this morning. The fact is that the deposit is not, as Aggra percent, but that it belongs to Government by Reg. XLV. of 1783, the approaching period of which law has been announced four months. By the new law the Sudder Court will be empowered to make rules for the sale. Prigs, must prick on the Sudder when the new law is passed.

— The letters and papers sent by the last Mail on the 10th instant from Calcutta as stated in the Englishman, was 4508; but we must the number sent by the express to complete the account; to this number must be added 4500 letters and 479 newspapers sent by the India steamer on the 10th instant.

— The Herkers has just published a General Order by the Governor General of India, which places his Lordship's character in a most favourable light. He has resolved generally to assist the officers who may be appointed to the new stations of Subaboo, Kusaowee, Umbala, Kora and Narsingpore, and who may be obliged to erect bungalows, by allowing them to the extent of three years' wages, with interest at five per cent. The sum is to be repaid by a monthly deduction of this tentage. [We are obliged to exclude the order to make room for the Mail news; but will give it next week.]

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

— Public entertainments are the order of the day, or rather of the night. Last week the community of Calcutta entertained Sir Hugh Gough, on the 20th Rumbourge Courages, Eng. gave a very splendid entertainment to Mr. H. T. Princep on the occasion of his approaching departure for Europe. On the same day, as it would appear, from the Star, Mr. H. T. Princep gave an entertainment to Sir Hugh Gough. On Tuesday evening, the Deputy Governor entertained Sir Hugh and the officers who have returned from the China Expedition as a Ball and Supper.

— A large meeting of the most respectable gentlemen in the Native community was held at the College Hall, when it was resolved to present an address to Mr. H. T. Princep, who quits the Supreme Council and India, on the 26th of next month, to embark for England in the Tenacris steamer.

— The London Mail of the 6th January is just arrived, and we annex a preview of the most interesting intelligence.

OVERLAND MAIL.

The London Mail of the 6th of January reached Calcutta early yesterday morning. The steamer bearing the Mail quitted Suet on the 25th of January.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert continued in the enjoyment of excellent health. It is said "in quarters where information can be relied on that Her Majesty's amercement will take place early in March."

Parliament was appointed to meet for the transaction of business on the 24th of February. The country, deserving of special gratitude for the liberal and wise spirit, which provided them with the means of affording much benefit by their labours to their fellow-countrymen. We are glad to hear that they are very soon to be distributed to different stations upon the Island, and sincerely hope that the patronage of the Ceylon authorities will best be secured to the interests of the service. Some of them have particularly distinguished themselves in special departments of medical science, and to those the greatest number should be given, with a view to hold out encouragement to their successors, to follow in their footsteps and earn the sure reward of ability and exertion.—Engl.

THE CAMBRIDGE FUNCTION.—The Cambridge Tracts for the Times (except The Ecclesiologist) are growing even worse than their default (Ireland) predecessor. What will our readers think of the following passage in the very last Number?

"And now that we are on the subject, it may be allowed us to say a few words on the state of another large district in the Metropolis. We doubt if there can be a more painful contemplation for the Churchman than the erection of that magnificent temple in St. George's Fields; not only that that beautiful building should be designed for the use of a congregation, but that our own incredible apathy should have left the enormous population, in the heart of which it is rising, so absolutely without churches or clergy, as to make it almost a subject of consternation, that the inhabitants may at last obtain access to the Holy Sacraments, though at Fort and other Altars. In strange and fearful contrast to the northern bank of the Thames, we believe that the only effort made of late years, in this most neglected part of the diocese of Winchester, to remove overwhelming spiritual destitution, has been the licensing of two small, inconspicuous, and unecclesiastical conventicles as pseudo-episcopal chapels! When we think, that, in a few months, in the midst of this spiritual desert, there will be a new and magnificent temple, without the odious intrusion of pews or the yoke of penance, a church such as St. George's, with an ark and numerous clergy, continual services, and a solemn ceremonial to suit that we must tremble, as Churchmen, for the consequences."

The parish of Lambeth, abutting in the diocese of Winchester, is more properly the province of the Archbishop, whose Palace is situated in it, who is the patron of the living, and whose former Chaplain, Dr. O'Byrne, is the incumbent. For the Bishop of Winchester to show any solicitude in this portion of his diocese, would certainly be regarded as disrespectful to the Primate.

But, in the first place, the southern bank never was so destitute a state as the northern. The parish of Newstep, with some 80,000 inhabitants, had, we believe, some ten years since, only one church. The parish of Lambeth, with about the same population, had four.

But let us look at "the southern bank of the Thames!"

The churches either already consecrated, or in progress, are as follows:—

Lambeth	St. Mary's.
Do	Holy Trinity.
Do	St. Michael.
Battersea	St. George's.
Bermondsey	St. James's.
Chapelwain	St. Andrew's.
Do	(building.)
Canterbury	Christ Church.
Do	(building.)
Peckham	St. John's.
Motherhill	Holy Trinity.
Do	Christ Church.
Southwark	All Saints.
Do	St. Peter's.
Do	St. Saviour's.
Do	St. George's.

These sixteen churches will seat about twenty-two thousand persons, and they have all been consecrated within the last ten or twelve years, on the Southern bank of the Thames, and by the present Bishop. Add in the face of these numbers, that the whole of the island of Great Britain is divided into 1,000 parishes, of which 1,000 churches cannot easily be hidden; the Ecclesiologist might find nothing better than dead, save the licensing of two small conventicles as Episcopal chapels. Are not such representations as these quite outrageous?

But we pass to another and a yet more fearful part of the subject. This Ecclesiologist, in the first part of which the patronage of the Bishops of Chester and Winchester is paraded, holds the erection of a great new-house "almost a matter for congratulation." And why? Not that the poor labourers of the Gospel preached unto them, for even the Ecclesiologist cannot venture to hope that this will be the case; nor that they may have opportunity for the worship of God; for this will not be the worship carried on in that place. No, but the inhabitants "may at last obtain access to the Holy Sacraments, though at Fort and other Altars."

Now, this is sheer hypocrisy. The writer of the paper in the Ecclesiologist speaks of having seen the new-house in question. He says, therefore, that instead of being placed where no other forts or altars (as he calls them) are to be found, it is within the night, and within the hearing of the bells, of several churches and chapels of the Establishment. It is, within sight, for instance, of Saint John's, Waterloo Bridge-road; of the Asylum Chapel, of the Philanthropic Chapel, and of one or two others.

How, then, can it be said that "the inhabitants may, at last, obtain access to the Holy Sacraments?" There may have been a want of accommodation for hearing the word, or for conveniently worshipping God; but means of access to the Sacraments were not wanting.

Did the Ecclesiologist ever hear an inhabitant of St. George's-fields who could find neither Baptism nor the Lord's Supper within his reach? No; the whole thing is a miserable pretext. The Ecclesiologist feels a secret joy at the uprisings of Roman Churches and Cathedrals, and only wants courage to express his feelings frankly and honestly.—Record.

APOTHECARY MEDICINE.—In the Preface to the second portion of Mr. Forme's Remarks, Messrs. Noble and Newman thus enunciate this doctrine:—"How often Jesus Christ left the world, he breathed the Holy Spirit into his apostles, giving them the power of transmitting this precious gift to others by prayer and the imposition of hands: that the apostles so transmitted it to others, and they again to others, and that it is this way it has been preserved in the world to the present day."

How is this disputed with Episcopal authority? It is regarded not as a branch of order merely, or a deviation from Apostolical precedent, but as a surrender of the Christian priesthood; a rejection of all the power which Christ bestowed on his apostles; a rejection; and the attempt to substitute any other form of ordination for it, or to seek communion with Churches through any non-Episcopal association, is to be regarded, not as a solemn merely, but as an INEXCUSABLE LIE.

Such is the nature of the position taken. "The gift of the Holy Ghost" has been preserved in the world, how then, if the Episcopal succession is to seek communion with Christ by any other channel is to attempt an "impossibility."

It is, perhaps, hardly possible for any proposition to be more broadly and palpably opposed to history than this.

1. That "the gift of the Holy Ghost" was handed down from Jesus Christ to his apostles, and only then preserved in the world? Why, how is this reconcilable with the notorious fact that Rome herself, viewed throughout the West, as the "mother and mistress of all Churches" was ruled during the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries by a set of men whom Cardinal Baronius calls "monsters of wickedness." And Gerbert tells us, that "for nearly a hundred and fifty years, about fifty Popes, from John VIII. to Leo IX., devoted wholly the virtue of their predecessors, being apostate rather than apostolic."

But we thus confined to the middle age? Far from it. Did we not quote, only a week or two back, a sentence or two from the Times newspaper, to the following effect?

"Dr. Philpotts seems to claim some mysterious doctrine, which is laudable to rest, over the minds and consciences of the clergy of the diocese of Exeter, because a layman, a Minister of the day, has made him his Bishop. Was there any mysterious infusion of the Holy Spirit upon two worldlings as I could marvel, because Pitt gave each of them for secular services the richest bishoprics in the kingdom? The progeny of one of whom is an infatuated man, who the revenues of the Church in Spain, as they were shamefully humped upon him by his unprincipled father?"

And is it not matter of general notoriety, that one of the parties alluded to in the last clause of this paragraph, a clergyman and a cathedral dignitary, was a deceiver at the last? Episcopacy may be the amount of some 2,000, or 4,000, or 6,000. We now have upon paper a word; and we speak merely of what has already appeared in half the newspapers in London.

2. That now of facts of an exactly opposite character.

About a century since there lived an honest citizen in London, who left behind him an opinion of such promise, that a noble Lady offered him an University education for her Church, with her extensive allowance. This offer, which we believe him to retain provision for life, the youth declined, casting in his lot with the dissenting Dissenters, and among them he lived and died, the minister of one of their most flourishing churches in a country town.

He left behind him a little volume, entitled, The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, of which it is but moderate praise to say, that it has been the means of converting many, and the gift of the Holy Ghost on more souls than any bishop or any other of our times can hope to welcome in heaven as his spiritual children.

Just fifty years after, a copy of this little book fell into the hands of a young gentleman of gay and worldly habits, immersed in pleasure and public business, and who, though baptised and confirmed in the Church, and a member of the University, was an utter stranger to the very first rudiments of spiritual religion. It was read, and thought over, and, in his case, as in thousands of others, it was made the means of giving his heart. He became "a new man;" he received "the gift of the Holy Ghost;" and the medium by which this entire change was effected, was that little volume, the work of a Dissenting minister.—The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul.

But the change became manifest by its fruits. The young gentleman himself, though only a layman, felt inwardly moved to become a teacher of religion. He wrote and published a book, called, A Practical View of Christianity,—of which it may perhaps be said with truth, the world has not yet seen a copy. It was written by the volume in which its author owed his conversion.

It was on a few more years, and we behold a valuable young clergyman, who had just taken his degree without any just or serious views of his responsibilities, and without any personal knowledge of that Christianity which he had just taken to teach. A copy of the Practical View of Christianity is put into his hands. He opens it; it is arrested by the power of the Holy Spirit; the night passes on, but he is unable to lay down the book until he has perused it completely; and he rises up a changed man. And the fruits of this change, even if we only think of what has already passed, have probably exceeded either of the former. But when we add together the three works, The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, The Practical View of Christianity, and The Annals of the Church, and contemplate their united effects in the Church of Christ,—not in England only, nor merely in Europe, but throughout the whole world,—how do these unnumbered acts of "apostolical succession" fade into insignificance, or at least into degrees of indistinction, that men's minds would be drawn to such a point as to dispute about external forms and points of order.

When we trace up the Annals of the Church to its providential source, we find the Practical View of Christianity; and then follow that work upwards to its source, the Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, and find its author a Dissenting minister, who we will not add together the three works, all good countries, and all just authors do proceed, and we see, in the evidence of undeniable fact, it is not true that "the gift of the Holy Ghost" was handed, as Messrs. Noble and Newman would teach us, to any external lineage of so-called apostolical succession.—Record.

CASE OF THE REV. MR. DRUMMOND.—A considerable sensation has been caused in the religious world, by the resignation of the Rev. Mr. Drummond, clergyman of the Trinity Episcopal Chapel, which we announced in our last. The correspondence which passed between the Right Rev. Bishop Trenchard and the Rev. Gentleman on the occasion, has been laid before the public, and at once excited the cause of the secession and of the schism which threatens to ensue. The Rev. Mr. Drummond has been in the habit of holding private social prayer-meetings, and giving weekly expository lectures, at which, instead of using the liturgy of the Church, he used his own notes. Such meetings the Bishop considered as falling under the condemnation of the 26th canon of the Scottish Episcopal Church on the uniformity to be observed in public worship, which canon declares, "That, if any clergyman shall officiate or preach in any place, publicly, without leave, the Liberty at all, he shall, for the first offence, be suspended from his office, and, for the second, be deprived of his office." On the other hand, differed as to the interpretation of this canon, and asserted, that he considered these meetings as private or congregational.

From local matters, the controversy has been carried to the congregation also; and, recently, the rooms in which they are held, for the time, my own private room. The 11th canon, however, could not turn those meetings into a schism, as they were not for the firm and decided conclusion.—"My conviction that your ministrations in the Glastonbury Hall are illegal, is founded on the conviction that they are schismatic, and that they are contrary to the 26th canon." Mr. Drummond, remaining obstinately obstinate in his opinion that these meetings are essential to the fulfilment of ministerial duty, and that he has no charge in itself of leaving the question before the General Synod, from whence an appeal lies to the College of Bishops. Mr. Drummond, in the course of the correspondence, has made many fine mistakes, which the Bishop has thus taken exception, have been unfortunately held by him during the ten years of his

PROSPECTUS.

IT is proposed to publish, by subscription, a work in Eight Books, blank verse, to be entitled PARADISE, OR THE INVISIBLE WORLD.
By W. ROBINSON, Author of "Mansueta."
The Work treats on the state of disembodied souls, both that of the saved, and that of the lost;
but chiefly on the state of happy souls.
It is a commonly received opinion among Presbyterians, that the disembodied soul goes at once to Heaven or Hell; but this opinion appears to some,
and to the author among others, to be unsupported by Scripture. The doctrine taught in Scripture seems to be that of an intermediate state: not a purgatory, nor a state of probation; but a state of rest and happiness for the righteous, and of misery for the wicked; while Heaven and Hell are reserved till after the resurrection and the judgment. The righteous, it is believed, will not enter Heaven till they all enter it together at the invitation: "Come ye blessed of my Father," &c.

nor the wicked enter Hell, till they all enter together, when the Great Judge shall say: "Ye part ye cursed into everlasting fire," &c.

The arguments in favour of an intermediate state, and replies to the objections usually brought against that state are, printed by Messrs. Nelson & Co. in that those who differ in opinion from the author, may, it is believed, read the other part of the work without finding any thing unreasonably different from their own views of the state in questioned souls.

The author is quite ready to acknowledge, that the doctrine of an intermediate state is a do-ctinal; and he has been treated as such; but truth is preferable to error, even in non-doctrinal he has thought the subject of sufficient importance to be laid before his fellow-Christians for their consideration; and he hopes, that his manner of handling it will not inflict the least wound on the feelings of those, who differ from him.

The advocacy of this doctrine was not a part and that not even the main part of the object, which the author proposed to himself; his object was that of calling the attention of his fellow-Christians to the great question of the intermediate, and thus promoting their spirituality of mind; and he ventures to hope, and his hope is corroborated by the testimony of a few plain Christians, that have seen the whole manuscript and peruse of it, that the avowed reader will not carry it work without some spiritual advantage.

* * The work will be printed in Demy 8vo. and will contain about 400 pages. Price bound in cloth 6 Ropes.

Persons desirous of subscribing to the work as printed in cloth, may send orders to the B. &

THE NEW QUARTERLY SESSIONS.—The Hurkar congratulated us last Wednesday on the fact that there was a public, at such places as Malda and Nocolly, in the outskirts of civilisation, and that its voice was heard at Government Houses through its constituted organs. If our recollection be correct, it is not quite so new a thing as the Hurkar supposes, that the public voice should be listened to at Government Houses; though it is altogether a new and unexpected event that this voice should enjoy more favour with the public authorities than with our contemporary, the champion of popular rights. It is not so astonishing to find Government on the side of the people, as to see the Hurkar voting against them.

Just to the point: There are seven Joint or subordinate Magistrates in the Lower Provinces, and all the prisoners committed by them are sent up to the chief session of the district to be tried by the Sessions Judge at his monthly jail delivery. It appears to have occurred to Government that this system of administering justice would admit of improvement; that instead of making the mountains go to Mahomed, it would be better to make Mahomed go to the mountains; and that instead of confining six or seven hundred prosecutors and witnesses in each district to travel a distance of many miles to the station of the Judge, it would be more conducive to the ends of justice to direct the Judge to proceed to the station of the Joint Magistrate, and hold the Sessions there.

A circular letter was therefore sent to the Commissioners, the Sessions Judges, and the Magistrates, requiring their sentiments on the proposed change. The Commissioners and the Magistrates, almost without exception, voted in favour of it. The Civil Judges objected to it.

The arguments against the alteration were, that the absence of the Sessions Judge, who is also the Civil Judge, from his own court, would impede the transaction of civil business over which he presides; that a quarterly session at the Joint Magistrates would subject prisoners to a more protracted confinement in jail before they were brought to trial, and that witnesses would be more likely to give correct evidence immediately after the crime was committed than after an interval of two or three months. The arguments in favour of the measure were, that the detection and punishment of crime would be more, if the Sessions were held on the spot, and certain, if the Sessions were held on the spot, and the Sessions Judges. The Executive Government prosecutors and witnesses were spared the inconvenience and expense of a journey to the station of the Judge, and the prospect of an indefinite detention there; and that great benefit would result from a periodical visit to the station of the Joint Magistrates by the chief authority in the district. We must confess that the arguments in favour of the plan appear to outweigh those which are advanced against it. By this new arrangement, the Civil Judge will be obliged, if he wishes to abstract one month in the year from the time devoted to civil business; but the inconvenience which this occasions might be greatly mitigated by directing the Principal Sudder Ameen to conduct the current duties of his office. The hardship to prisoners when their confinement before trial is protracted, is a more serious consideration. This would doubtless be an evil—but it must not be forgotten that the present system is fraught with perhaps greater evils; and that if the proposed modification should serve in a great degree to remove them, the minor evil that it might entail would be no valid objection to its being adopted. No plan that can be devised either in this country or in England, will be free from objection; and we have therefore to choose that which will be productive of the least inconvenience;—and assuredly it is a smaller grievance that a prisoner against whom there is sufficient evidence of guilt to justify his commitment, should remain two or even three months in confinement before trial, than that twenty people should be obliged to march a distance of a hundred miles, at all seasons of the year, to prove him guilty.

The greatest obstacle in this country to the administration of justice is the entire absence of all co-operation on the part of the people. They will not assist in the detection or conviction of crime; and the best intentioned government cannot protect their persons or property in spite of themselves. To remove this indispotion and to secure their co-operation is therefore one of the first steps of improvement. It has been found by experience that this indispotion springs in a greater measure from the inconveniences to which our institutions subject them, when their aid is required for the prosecution of offenders. The object of the present arrangement is to remove this objection; and to lessen the evils of attendance on the criminal courts. When men are not required to travel to a great distance at all seasons of the year, amidst the scorching blasts of summer, and the drenching torrents of the rainy season, it is expected that they will be less disposed to conceal offences and to hush up enquiries, and that crime will enjoy less impunity. If such should be the result of the proposed measure of bringing justice to the door of the Joint Magistrates, the inconvenience to the rogues of a more prolonged confinement before trial,—and to civil sutors,—and even to the Civil and Session Judges, will be comparatively trifling. That is to say, the advantage to the public interests of the community will be greater than the disadvantages; and this will be a sufficient justification of the change. It is, we suppose, in this view of the case, that the proposed measure has been adopted, notwithstanding the reluctance of the Sudder Court and the Sessions Judges. The Executive Government has therefore the merit of good intentions, however in the judgment of the Hurkar, it may lack that of wisdom. The benefits which the opinion of those who are responsible for the administration of justice in these subordinate jurisdictions, will inevitably result from this change, was enough to warrant the experiment; and at present the arrangement is only experimental. At any rate, the assent of the Joint Magistrates has the credit of disinterestedness. They would scarcely invite their superiors to visit their secluded provinces unless a regard for the public advantage outweighed all considerations of private interest.

The Hurkar is apprehensive lest the Sessions Judges should loiter on the road, to follow any game which may cross their path, and thus prolong the agony of civil suitors. Our contemporary's experience is evidently modern. He has yet to learn that since the days of Lord William Bentinck the indulgence in field sports on the part of civilians has become the exception, instead of the rule. We will not venture to deny that even under the present regime, notwithstanding that very ungenerally practice of requiring a return of every day's duty, some of the Civilians are fonder of pursuing jackals than criminals. We fear they do sometimes contrive to elude the vigilance of the Deputy Governor by reporting themselves as employed in miscellaneous duties, when out hunting and shooting; but their privileges are grievously curtailed, and the irrational animals in their district have more rest, and the rational beings who prey on their fellows, less. It is very possible that Government may require them to ride post, and their field sports will then be confined to the acquisition of a snipe or wild duck for dinner. Why should an editor, condemned to the exhausting drudgery of a daily paper, envy the overworked Civil and Session Judge so trifling a recreation?

THE UNION BANK.—At the Meeting of the Proprietors of the Union Bank which had been fixed for the 21st of February to receive the Report of the Committee appointed to investigate its transactions with the late firm of Gilmore and Co., the Report was presented, and produced a warm discussion. In the course of their investigations the Committee appear to have discovered that the interests of the Bank,—that is of the Sliam holders,—had not been duly attended to by the Directors; and that the loss of five lakhs of Rupees which the failure of that firm has entailed on the Bank, was to be attributed in measure to their negligence. The Report had been submitted to the Secretary, and it was resolved therefore to place it in his hands for any justificatory remarks which he might have in his power to offer. The Committee at the same time demanded that the names, as well as Minutes of the Directors, who were mixed up with this transaction, should be revealed to them. This gave rise to considdarable alteration, and the revelation of the names of the Directors was stoutly resisted by Mr. Turton, and it was ultimately resolved that the minutes should be given up without the names. Under all the circumstances of the case, this resolution appears wise and prudent. Doubtless the members of the Committee were actuated by a virtuous indignation at the mismanagement of the Directors, which had entailed loss on the Institution, and depreciated the property of the Shareholders. Still, the demand for the names had something of a vindictive aspect; and the disclosure might have been more detrimental to the offenders, than beneficial to the general interests of the Bank. It would have been tantamount to a breach of that confidence under the protection of which the Directors venture to record their acquiescence or refusal of every request for accommodation. It is just possible, as the public suspects, that the interest of the proprietors may have been postponed to that of the mercenary body, from which the Directors are chosen; in other words, that in the disposal of the Bank Capital, the interest of those who wished to borrow was more considered than that of the individuals whose money was to be lent. Such imperfections belong to the Union Bank, as common with all Joint Stock Banks. Still the disclosure of the names to those who considered themselves bound by the obligations of duty to make an example of the delinquents, would have been found in the end mischievous, and men of honour and consideration might have appeared unwilling to accept seats in the Direction, and to put themselves in so invidious a position. The surrender of the minutes without the names will answer every public and available purpose, while the fearless scrutiny of the Committee will be found to have promoted the general welfare of the Bank by rendering such sacrifices of public to individual interests, more rare. At the same time, the leaders of the Bank must be aware from the very small majority with which they were able to resist the production of the names—21 to 10—that the public suspicion of mismanagement on the part of the Directors, is not to be despised.

After the Gilmore discussion had ceased, the question about the advances which the Bank had made on factories of various sorts and descriptions came upon the tapis, and was laid on the shelf. Mr. Longueville Clarke made apparently the longest speech on the occasion, and wisely observed, that however sound might be the reasons which had led the Directors, to this mode of employing the funds of the Bank, it was sufficient that the body of the Proprietors, of whom the Directors were only trustees, disapproved of this course, to induce them to alter it at the earliest practicable moment. We beg to second Mr. Clarke's representation. All the proprietors who have no interest in Indigo concerns, and who have no other object than to obtain a fair interest for their capital in bond safe banking transactions, are opposed to the course which the Bank has pursued in thus locking up its capital in Indigo, sugar and other factories, and loaning money at five per cent. to carry them on. The example of the old houses,—the first powers on which they were called after Palmer's failure,—has not been lost on the public. Their defence is treated in a great measure to their confusion with such factories. They may not have fallen by the factories, but every man believes they did, and wishes that his own money may not be placed in the same jeopardy. Some of the Bank Shareholders too, who are occasionally behind the scenes, are enabled to estimate the intrinsic value of such factories when it becomes necessary to sell them. They have heard that some of the factories set up by the houses that went into the Insolvent Court last year, cost some three or four lakhs of Rupees, and have since been sold for a tenth of the sum. They are anxious to rescue the Bank from such dangerous associations; and who will say that they are wrong?

Mr. Clarke described the process by which the Bank had been led into the factories. The capital was originally forty lakhs of Rupees. Some one proposed to set up a rival Bank, and the Directors, to keep down competition, doubled their capital, and eventually raised it to One million sterling. The Bank, we must remark, had also resolved, by a natural ambition, to keep shoulder to shoulder in the matter of dividends with the Bank of Bengal which is a chartered Bank, and has as large a capital in paper money,—as it is supported by the credit of Government,—as it has in bullion. It therefore began to lend out the superfluous capital which had been created by the fear of this competition on high interest to "assist the productive resources" of the country; and it was thus led into these very dubious speculations, which it is much easier to enter into, than to escape from, unthought. If the Bank had determined to recall all its capital thus embarked, at the end of the last indigo season, that capital would have been deteriorated one-fourth. It must go on with them, for bad as the connection is, the sudden withdrawal from it, would be worse. It would be idle to dictate to the Bank, the sum that shall be given for advances next year. If any factories that are dependent on the Bank, are not supplied with funds for 'going on,' they will stand still, and the value of them will fall almost to zero. The safety of the Bank consists in the firm determination of the Proprietors to withdraw from these agricultural speculations; and to watch with the most vigilant and even suspicious eye, the proceedings of the Directors in reference to them, and to make it the one object of attention to close them at the earliest practicable and safe moment. Then follow up Mr. Turton's sage advice, and if there is no mercantile employment for the redundancy of capital, give it back to the shareholders 'to make a kirk or a mill of it,' as they like.

ANSWER TO J. H. S. ON THE PUSHEY ARTICLE.—We owe many apologies to our correspondent J. H. S. for having postponed the publication of his letter.

He asks whether the anti-Pushey extracts which we have given in this journal, have not a tendency, under pretence of attacking Pusheyism, to throw odium on the peculiarities of the Church of England. The use of the word pretences in this sentence may be understood as intended to charge us with unfair intentions. It may not have been so designed by our correspondent; but we cannot allow the expression to pass without assuring him that nothing could be farther from our mind than the idea of inflicting any injury on the Church of England by the publication of these extracts. Our object was to point out, for the information of our readers, the progress which Pusheyism is making towards Rome.

Our correspondent's questions, whether there is a sentiment contained in the Circular to the Parliaments of Christ Church Herton, which ninety-nine out of a hundred Anglicans are not taught to believe from their candle. The most prominent of these sentiments is the identity of baptism with regeneration. We are sorry to see such a statement avowed with such confidence by a member of the Church of England. There can scarcely be an error more fatal to the interests of morality and religion than that, a man is placed in a state of grace and salvation by a ceremony performed on him in his unconscious infancy.—But we must not enter on a subject which would bring us within the circle of doctrinal controversy. That the liturgy of the Church of England, framed in the days of Elizabeth to unite all parties, gives some support to the doctrines which the Puseyites have adopted, and are pushing to the extreme is, we believe, denied by none. So effectually was the object answered, that out of 8400 beneficed clergymen, who had been staunch Catholics a year before, in the days of Queen Mary, less than two hundred found it impossible to reconcile the reformed ritual with their consciences, and resigned their benefices. But the Articles and Homilies were framed in order to give a Protestant interpretation to the Liturgy, and in this sense it has been used generally by the Clergy of the established Church.

Hence the Puseyites are found to teach the Homilies, and repudiate as far as possible, the Articles, while they cling with peculiar fondness to the Liturgy, and thereby explain in some measure the assertion made by Lord Clarendon in the House of Lords that the Church of England had a Popish liturgy, and Calvinistic Articles. But we cannot bring ourselves to the conclusion of our correspondent that there exists but a solitary One Per Cent. among the Anglicans who do not believe that the baptism of an infant by a clergyman is the instrument of salvation. While we were writing this article we received a copy of the Rev. Mr. York's letter to the Bishop of London, in which he goes over the six notions which are the mainstays of the Puseyite movement in the Church. One of these is, that in Episcopalian baptism there is immediately and invariably an effected regeneration. On this subject this beneficed clergyman has the following very apposite remarks. We should be sorry to fill that ninety-nine out of every hundred clergymen of the Church of England teach a different doctrine.

"The third notion is, that in Episcopalian baptism there is immediately and invariably an effected regeneration.

"If I may be allowed to say so, your Lordship's connecting regeneration with justification was incorrect. To be regenerated without being justified, or to be justified without being regenerated would equally constitute a nullity. Besides which, as in the rays of light all colors co-exist, so are the spiritual blessings which come from Christ essentially inseparable; indeed, all is one, if Christ is ours. But bearing this in mind, even we in the face of God and man affirm, that every episcopally baptized child is both regenerated and justified! To affirm this, we affirm what not only our Lord, but the whole world has directly contrary to all that by its natural eye and ears, or by its natural judgment and conscience, it can merely observe and comprehend. Are there not myriads of persons who, having been baptized, are still so far from being heavenly minded, that they are evidently more formalists; more, more, drunkards, thieves, courtiers, worse, dissipated, and selfish? I have been assured, my Lord, that such papers as the Weekly Dispatch seized with immoderate glee and triumph upon your Lordship's statements, as being one of the weakest observations might disprove."

"To remove the difficulty, it is indeed sometimes said, that the grace bestowed in baptism is often speedily withdrawn or lost. Unquestionably so; but this opinion is, as it respects us, the view it gives of baptismal grace, is still may be the sincere opinion of those who now avow it. They may however, as we frequently observe, be mistaken. All episcopally baptized infants are, when baptized, in a scripture state; and that afterwards grace falls in the greater number, as life falls in spring-tides slipped by frost. The theory of a "scriptural state" is not indeed seen exactly to agree with the manifestations of feeling made by children at the font; but whether it does or not, we have to ask, was this theory of evanescent grace the theory of the reformers? Did they believe, that a child or a man could be regenerate and justified one moment, and be unregenerated and unjustified the next?

It is not, we admit, a new thing to call Charles the First, a Martyr. The practice came in with the Restoration, and represented very correctly the feelings of the triumphant Cavaliers; but the party feelings in which the commemoration of his death originated, have gradually subsided; and the revival of them can serve no purpose but to rekindle the religious pride and animosity of that age. It is perfectly certain that the 30th. of January is marked in the Oxford Almanacs as the day of Charles King and Martyr. It is also equally as certain that Dr. Hook proclaimed in the Chapel Royal that the Church of England boasted the only Royal Martyr in the Calendar, as that this Royal Martyr, having received only Presbyterian baptism, his Christianity is more problematic than his Martyrdom; but the peculiar value which is now placed on the commemoration of Charles the First takes its rise from the present movement at Oxford, and unhappily indicates a disposition to revive the days of Land and the High Commission Court.

Our Correspondent says, Puseyism is very popular in India. We fear he is mistaken. We hear of one clergyman on this Establishment after another, adopting these views. As Ceylon we are told that with one exception the Clergymen are universally imbued with the sentiments of the Oxford School; and the Journal des Villes et des Campagnes, published in Paris on the 26th October last, asserts on the authority of the Vicar Apostolic of Pondicherry, that one of the Ministers on the Madras establishment is a Puseyite "to the bottom of his soul." The whole passage is worth extracting.

"A Protestant minister of the Madras Presbytery (he is of the Established Church), passed through Pondicherry last week on his way to Spion and Trichinopoly. He came to see me. He brought a letter of introduction from M. Ch. Claret Secretary at Madras. This minister is a Puseyite to the bottom of his soul. He talks much of the necessity of reuniting the Anglican Catholics, as he calls them, with the Roman Catholics, and says that it is not difficult to accomplish it; that it would be forming a false judgment of them to suppose that they have hostile feelings; that there is a fair progress towards reunion; that we ought to be charitable in all things, and especially in what belongs to religion; that some of the Anglicans have gone so far as saying that our Lord was not in the Eucharist... that he is there in a real presence, and not merely in a presence of faith, or symbolically, &c. The minister always wears his clerical dress (neatly altered). He is never in ordinary clothes. He is unmarried."

Perhaps it is in reference to this Minister that the following passage speaks. It appears in the Review of the 19th December last.

"It appears, that one of these recruits from the orthodoxy of our Church, recently made a visit of complaisance to the Poughbisher by which that Presbytery arrayed in his policy. The Minister, who afterwards attended the mass-house in his canonical attire, and, in this dress of a clergyman of the Church of England, paraded the elements pronounced to be transubstantiated. The bearing of this person in regard to doctrinal and ceremonial matters had, as we are informed, previously been so gross as to occasion great offence to his brethren in the ministry. This act, however, was so flagrant, that they united in making a formal complaint to the archdeacon and bishop. But the bishop would not interpose. He advised the withdrawal of the recusant minister. The ecclesiastical sentence whatever was passed on the culprit, but on the contrary, he was sanctified, with the sanction of his diocesan, to a new station: we rather think Trichinopoly."

We will trespass on the reader's patience with only one more extract.

"During Lent, it is the custom for the best preachers at Rome to preach every day in the week, except Sunday. On one occasion, the last season of Lent, the Padre Grossi, who was remarkable for his eloquence, was preaching in the English church. His sermon was on the advantages of the Roman Church, the danger of schism. After a passionate appeal to the Greeks, he, urging them without delay to enter into the sanctuary of the Papal Church, concluded with the following appeal to Puseyites:—"There is yet a class of persons, very numerous, who I would wish to address, although I fear that there may be none here; still, perchance, should there be any, to them I turn: O! Puseyites, what shall I say to you? You know that you are not Protestants, and we know you are not Catholics; you are much nearer to us than to them. Why will you not come over entirely to us? The mother Church has been long waiting with open arms to receive you, and the holy virgin with extended arms is ready to embrace you. Why do you longer waver in the declaration of our faith? Why do you not make the pécunia pass which separates you from us?"

THE SOMNATH GATES.—Lord Ellenborough continues to drag the Sacred Gates after him with all the fondness which we may suppose a Roman General to have felt for the spoils of a conquered country which were to grace his triumphal progress up the via sacra. They have formed the chief attraction of his Lordship's entombment in the eyes of the Hindoos, hundreds of whom have been seen daily to present their homage and their offerings to the veiled Lysak in which they are mysteriously concealed. Our correspondents in the Camp assure us that the Governor General has bought golden opinions of the Hindoos for this act of devotion to Hindoo interests. But it is much to be questioned whether the value of such feelings is not overbalanced by the wound which is thereby inflicted on the feelings of the Mahomedans. The policy of any measure which should aggravate the animosity which exists between the two classes in this empire, is exceedingly doubtful. It has hitherto been the aim of all our rulers to hold the balance between these acts with even and impartial a hand as possible, and we may yet have reason to regret the abandonment of this spirit of neutrality. It is impossible to foresee the consequences which may result from the humiliation thus inflicted on the most fanatic of our Indian subjects; and it is much to be feared that the next collision between the two sects, will be far more deadly than any previous conflict. If a single life is sacrificed in consequence of this idle procession of the rotten gates, it will be more than the gates themselves are worth.

The Hindoos have been taught by the very unusual respect paid to the gates by the rulers of British India to set a higher value on them; and they are become objects of worship almost to the same degree as if they contained the spirit of some Hindoo God. Is it befitting the majesty of Britain that its representative should carry in his train, with such unusual pomp, objects which attract the idolatrous veneration of the multitude? Is it befitting a Christian ruler, to bestow such a triumph on idolatry, and to give such an impulse to the superstitious feelings of its deluded votaries? It will not be forgotten with what extreme difficulty the public voice has succeeded in constraining the Government, both here and at home, to slide by its own professions made ten years since, to dissolve its connection with the superstitious of the Hindoos, and to deprive them of that support which they derive from the alliance of the State. Where is the propriety of undoing the labor of ten years; and courting the favour of the Hindoos by fostering that superstition, which is the cause of their national degradation? Every feeling of devotion to our rule which we may thus secure; must be gained at the expense of our own Christian character, and of the best interests of the country. The sooner the curtain drops on this scene of political inconsistency and religious degradation, the better.

It is mid that the Hindoo priests who yet live at Somnath, have refused to receive the gates. We hope the report is true. At any rate, it would be wise in Lord Ellenborough to believe it. It is now proceeding to Agra with the Gates, we hear, in his train. How easy would it be to drop them at Muttra, where they will be a real god-send to the priests. At Somnath no one will thank his Lordship for the gift, unless he should establish and pay a College of priests to preserve them. The minor Mahomedan Zemindars, in whose domains the temple stands, will probably pick them into the sea on attaining his majority, and thus save himself a pilgrimage to Mecca. At Muttra, which is a very holy place, where Krishna played with the milk-maids some thousand years ago, they will be most welcomed. The priests will receive them with gratitude, and deliver them down as an heirloom to their successors. They will augment the sanctity of the place, and the profits of the priests. We will not deny that the accidental loss of them in the Jumna, would be more agreeable than their being placed at Muttra by Christian agency; but there is only a choice of evils, and it is better to leave them there, than to parade them through the country. The only objection to this course, as far as we can see, is the awkwardness which may attend the revoking an order which has once emanated from the Governor General. But Lord Ellenborough, in his celebrated Simlah proclamation, has taught the Natives of India that the British Government is not inflexible. His Lordship has thus broken the ice, and may avail himself of the opening to escape from the dilemma in which the patronage of these gates has involved him. Or, his Lordship might issue another proclamation, stating that the brahmans at Somnath, not having duly appreciated the value of the gates, were unworthy of being intrusted with them, and that they were therefore transferred to those who knew how to prize them.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE SOCIETY.—We were anxious to testify our respect for our Correspondent, a Member of the Bible Society, and for the Institution he defends, by entering fully into the discussion to which he invites us; but we have found it impossible to command sufficient time. The subject is well worthy of mature consideration; and we shall not lose sight of it. As soon as we can find opportunity, we shall state fully our views respecting it. Yet it seems more fitting for the Bible Society itself, or at least some of its active members, as our present correspondent, to lay down the principles by which its proceedings in the matter of Translations ought and are to be guided. Nothing would afford us greater pleasure than to see truth and justice approximated by candid examination in this way; and our columns shall be freely opened to any communications for such an end, from our Correspondent, or from any of his fellow members of like temper.

In the mean time, we are justified, we imagine, in taking our Correspondent's letter as a confirmation of the statement, that the Calcutta Bible Society have resolved to refuse their assistance to any Oordoo translation of the New Testament, in which the name Jesus is not given in the spelling they have adopted. We had no reason to doubt the truth of the statement; but it is of such serious moment that its confirmation is important. We are therefore grateful to our correspondent for having afforded it.

THE CHANGES IN THE SAGOR DISTRICT.—Scarcely has there been so complete a housecleaning in our administration since we held the sceptre of India, as the last Gazette announces in reference to the Sagor and Nerbouda territories. The Governor General has changed the livid of the district and placed it under the direction of Major Sleeman. Considering the great talent of that officer, and his claims on the confidence, if not the gratitude, of Government, no man regrets this appointment. But all the covetous servants have been swept away as unexpectedly and as cleanly as though the Government had passed into the hands of a new dynasty. The local bailiff is also dissolved, and the consular officer abolished. Major Sleeman is to have twelve Military Assistants under him, and two battalions of Military police are to be forthwith organised to consist of 2400 men, at an annual cost, independent of European officers, of more than two lakhs of Rupees. The battle of Plancy made a violent and organic change in the system of Government than the Governor General has effected by one stroke of his pen.

The sudden and simultaneous removal of all the officers who have been employed in conducting the civil, criminal, and fiscal administration in this extensive province, is a very unusual proceeding, and unless it was imperatively required by their general usefulness for office, is calculated rather to retard than to promote the welfare of the people. It must tend to weaken the confidence of the public officers in the justice of Government and thus to destroy the spring of emulation. It is true, that the country has recently been in a disturbed state; but unless the discontent of the people can be traced distinctly to the oppression or even misconduct of the officers who have now been displaced, their removal will admit of little or no justification. Some of these officers are known to be eminently qualified for the duties of Government; and their administration has been beneficial to the country and acceptable to the people. This indiscriminate dismissal of every officer is ill calculated to increase the respect of the community for the measures of Government; it is more likely to impress them with an idea of the unstable and fugitive character of our institutions; and to make it more painfully visible that the British Government moves in a constant circle of change.

The sudden subtraction of men accustomed to the language and habits of the people, and acquainted with the laws which are administered, cannot but prove highly disadvantageous, and serve to subvert the whole administration of justice in this province, and to create general confusion. The appointment of a number of raw hands, without local experience, whose only title to the management of civil business is derivative from their gallantry in the field, is calculated to increase that confusion, and to disorganize the Government of the province. The new military Judges, Collectors and Magistrates can know little or nothing of the laws they are to administer, or of the duties they are to perform; and the people must pay the penalty of their ignorance. The organisation of a military police for this province, to execute writs at the point of the bayonet, and to distrust property by Haridars and Jemadars instead of by Darogahs, may possibly be required by the disturbed state of the district; but in this case we cannot boast of peace in India, however we may pride ourselves on the pacification of Asia.

THE STUDIES OF FORT WILLIAM COLLEGE.—We publish a reply to the observations we offered on this subject last week by the "Fable in the person of its humble representative, Alas!" and submit some brief remarks on his strictures.

He says that the Oordoo used in the Courts is in fact made up of Persian vocabularies with more than a few verbs and particles of Hindoosness. This is contrary to the positive orders of Government; which are, that the "Native" ministerial officers do not merely substitute a Hindoosness for a Persian verb at the end of the sentence, under the mistaken idea that such practice will be considered as fulfilling every object in view in making the change." The former our correspondent alludes to is one, which requires to be corrected, and not perpetuated, and the study of Persian is likely to lead to its continuance; and is therefore open to objection. It is highly to be desired that efforts should be made to give a uniformity and a "fixity" to the Oordoo official language, but this object is not likely to be attained by excluding it from the studies of the Civilian, who is required to use it in the administration of justice. The formation of a good model of Oordoo, which shall be universally adopted, will doubtless require more time than the improvement of Bengalee, but unless a commencement is made,—which does not appear as yet to have been the case,—the object must continue to elude our grasp.

Oodoo says, that the Persian and Hindoo together go to form the Oordoo. We do not question the accuracy of the statement; but we demur to the conclusion, that it is therefore better for the student to devote the very limited time allowed him at College, to the acquisition of two languages which enter into the composition of a third, instead of at once applying to that third language. The Saxon, the Latin and the French go to form English; yet who would venture to say that the shortest and most advisable course for a foreigner to pursue if he would acquire English, is to study the three languages which form its "constituent parts"?

As it regards Bengalee, it will be readily conceded, that the law terms are for the most part Persian, and must for the present be retained; but the student may acquire them in a month, without distracting his attention with Persian Grammar and Syntax. The official Bengalee, as every body knows, is a very barbarous mixture of Persian; but this was a natural consequence of the long use of that tongue in the Courts, and the preponderance of Mahomedans among the officers. Persian is now excluded, and one of the natural consequences is that the Hindoos are gradually obtaining a firmer footing in the Courts; and in a few years both the Native Judges and Native ministerial officers will consist for the most part of Hindoos. They bring their own language with them; and in twenty years from this time nothing will remain of the old lexicon, but a limited number of Persian legal terms, or such Persian words as have been entirely dominated, and are understood by every peasant. Persian therefore is totally unnecessary for the transaction of business in Bengal. To keep it up merely that the Civilian may be enabled to speak with acceptance to the Mahomedan Amils and the population of tyroes, would be to pursue an object not worth a fraction of the time and labour it must cost. It is far more important that he should speak with acceptance the language of the million, than the language of the few.

What is the use of teaching Bengalee to a man who is to administer affairs for 20 or 30 years in the Agna Presidency?—None whatever. If the service was divided according to the two official languages in use at this Presidency, and the Civilian were not allowed any interchange of offices, one language would suffice; but till this arrangement is made, a Civilian should qualify himself for both provinces; and as he cannot enter on the service without a knowledge of two languages, it is the dictate of reason and common sense that those two languages should not be, as at present, the Persian and the Hindoo, which are not used in any Court throughout the Presidency; but the Oordoo and the Bengalee, which are the languages now in use in every tribunal.

When Oodoo proceeds to affirm that Government "in selecting its system should make it clear that it is guided by the opinions of men who are qualified by their acquirements, by their practical acquaintance with the various bearings of the subject, and by the largeness and impartiality of their views, to form a sound judgment on this important subject; men not in any way likely to mislead the cry of 'Nothing like leather!'" we naturally suppose that by the latter men, he refers to men like ourselves. Will he forgive the presumption of our conjecture that in alluding to men of acquirements, and practical acquaintance with the bearings of the subject, and largeness and impartiality of views, he had half an eye to individuals like himself? We have no hesitation however in ranging ourselves among those who think there is "nothing like leather;" nothing like making the Civilian learn the two languages in which he will be required to administer the laws; and we willingly relinquish to others the credit of those large views which would set him to learn two languages because they form the constituent parts of a third; and which would send him forth qualified to preside in all Courts—by a knowledge of two languages neither of which are used, in any of them.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23.

—Mr. J. B. Elliott, one of the oldest and ablest members of the Civil Service, comes down to Calcutta immediately as one of the Judges of the Sudder Court. It is very gratifying to find that the natives have every confidence in his legal experience and independence, and consider that his appointment will raise the character of the Court in public estimation.

—Col. Mountain, of the Cameroons, who has rendered himself so conspicuous by his exertions in China, has been appointed Deputy Adjutant General of Queen's Troops at Madras.

—We are happy to state, that Khet Sing, the disaffected Raja of Churkaree, who has been soliciting for many years the restoration of his rights, whose cause has been espoused by the Court of Directors in vain, because of the passive resistance of the authorities in the North West, has been reconciled with military honours by Lord Ellenborough, and involved with the Government of the Jidpore principality, rendered vain by the rebellion and reluctance of the late Chief. He is thus released from the conditions of a pensioner on 6000 Rupees, always irregularly paid, and the enjoyment of a revenue of three or four lakhs of Rupees a year.

The London papers state, that Sir Henry Pottinger is likely to succeed the Marquis of Tweeddale at Madras. But this appointment depends on the contingency of Lord Ellenborough's recall, which will not happen, or his resignation, which is not very probable. The select of "peace in Asia" may throw the Gates, the editors Galt, here and there. Much will depend on the meeting and the temper of Parliament. We had generally understood that Sir Henry Pottinger was to be the military member of the Council of India, on Sir W. Caine's quitting it. Sir Charles Metcalfe is spoken of as the Governor of Madras; and the papers are about to marry him to a rich and titled Dugger. If this report be correct, Sir Charles may say, I have married a wife and cannot come.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

The young widow of the late chief of Gwalior, herself twelve years of age, has adopted a son of the age of nine, and the adoption has been sanctioned by the Governor General. All those fears which were expressed, that Government should take advantage of the occasion to enlarge the British possessions, have thus vanished. And, for ought that at present appears, all those hopes which were entertained of an improvement in the administration of that state, and of the suppression of all "Tyranny, Oppression, Injustice, Murder, Suicide, Slavery, Female Immolation, and all other such crimes" have vanished also.

Sir Hugh Gough, after having been "fitted and homed" in the City of Palaces, has proceeded to join his family at Bangalore. It is said he will return amongst us at the beginning of the next cold weather, when Sir Jasper Nicolls is expected to lay down the burden of office.

A charge of very gross and cruel conduct has just been brought to the Magistrate of the 24-Parganas against a Mrs. Smith, one of the most material witnesses for the defence of James Kiernan, for wounding and maiming. It appears that she has been in the habit of cruelly mistreating a female dependant, whom she called her slave. She kept the poor creature frequently chained by the neck, and got the word "lie," tattooed over the forehead. She has been sentenced to a fine of 200 Rupees and to six month's imprisonment. The punishment is scarcely equal to the crime.

Mrs. Vincent Eyre, lately one of the prisoners in Afghanistan, is the first in the field with a narrative of the events of that painfully interesting period which elapsed between the outbreak at Cabul, and the final annihilation of our troops on the 10th January. His work was published in London in the beginning of January and is spoken of by the papers which have been received by this Mail, in terms of great commendation.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

Dr. Corley's Journal of Medical and Physical Sciences has passed under the Editorial management of Dr. Evelyn; and the first number of the New Series has just made its appearance.

The first instalment of the regular mail came in yesterday, but without a single newspaper. The transit of the Express across the country from Bombay has been more rapid than any former occasion. It left Bombay on the 14th and reached Calcutta early in the morning of the 22d.

A correspondent of the Burkess states, that Akbar Khan has restored to Capt. Truap, the favorite Arab horse which was taken from him. Capt. Truap wrote to Akbar for it, and it is said to have been sent back to Hindostan.

The Burkess states, that letters have been received from Sir John McNell, forwarding authentic information of the death of Col. Stoddart and Sir Arthur Conolly at Bokhara. They were, it is said, publicly beheaded in the presence of a large number.

of soldiers. Capt. Conolly was offered his life on condition of turning Moslem, but indignantly rejected the offer.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

The arrangements which the Governor General has made for the Government of the Sanyal and Nerbula Territories, are published in the last Calcutta Gazette. It is a "root and branch work." All the European covenanted officers who had been employed in the administration, are swept out with one stroke of the besom. The Local Corps is disbanded; and the whole of the constabulary is reorganised. Major Sleeman is promoted with twelve Military Assistants, to be divided into three grades, and to receive respectively 500, 600 and 500 Rupees a month. The Major is at liberty to employ any of the "old hands," whom he approves of. The first specimen of the Military Police is exhibited in the plan. There are to be two battalions of Military constables to be offered: like the Regiments of the Line, but with a larger proportion of Native, and a smaller proportion of European, officers. So unexpected and organic a change has never been made before in the administration of any province under British rule.

Notwithstanding the kind assurance of the Committee appointed to investigate the claims of the Union Bank on the defunct firm of Gilman and Co. that its losses would be five, and not fifty lakhs of Rupees, and that the only improvement would be a slight diminution of the dividend, the Shareholders continued to desert, and are now quoted at 10 to 100 per share of 1000 Rupees each.

The Hindostan Steamer has made a most extraordinary run from Galle to Aden in nine days. She reached that Port on the 4th. She was likely to be detained three days coaling at Aden, where she will not enjoy the convenience of the Company's arrangements for the shipment of coal. If she reaches Suez in eight days, as the Burkess conjectures, she will have performed the voyage from the Suez Canal to Suez, exclusive of stoppages, within twenty-four days.

Dost Mahomed has at length, it seems, left the Lakshmi Court for Cabul. He was much pressed to remain longer, but he replied, that his son Akbar was writing to press his return. He has been received and treated as a Prince. Seven hundred Rupees a day have been allotted to him to the time of his quitting the Sikh territories. On his departure 10,000 Rs. in money and 50,000 Rupees worth of jewels were presented to him. This is polite. Sher Singh has nothing to fear, but from the Afghans, and the danger which now threatens him from them may be delayed and possibly averted if Dost Mahomed is enlisted on his side.

The duties of Resumption Commissioner lately in the hands of Mr. Elliott, have been distributed among the Judges of the various districts included in his jurisdiction. The business of resumption draws evidently to a close.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

The Native who were cheated out of their Goldmine by the Native Officers at the Treasury, and whom Mr. Lait's and Mr. Morton assisted in recovering the money from Government, have revived their gratitude to those gentlemen by presenting them with a piece of plate, and a hundred goldmines. They could do much to their Council, and they have only to give it themselves of their obligations. But where is the gratitude of Dyal Chand Hyndak, the Deputy Treasurer, who committed the fraud? What is the extent of his gratitude to his Council, for securing his acquittal and preventing Government from coming down on him for the money which he fraudulently took in its name? Instead of presenting a rich candlestick and a portion of the purloined goldmines, he sent his Council for their insoluble gratitude, he went to understand, down to Kales Chak, and lavished his gratitude on that goddess, to whose influence he ascribed his escape.

The Explicator announces some changes in consequence of Mr. Pattle's approaching departure from the country. Mr. Davidson returns to the Board of Revenue. Mr. Harvey becomes a Revenue Commissioner again, and Mr. W. Bracken is placed at the head of the Customs, the office he ought by right and reason to have had when it was last vacant.

A vessel, with 200 Coolies on board, has, it seems, been stopped by the Emigration Agent. The Explicator is indignant at the detention; but generally speaking, it is pleasing to find that the Agent of the Col. exercises such vigilance. As to the case itself, we must leave the particulars before we can join in running down the Registry.

The Explicator states, that Mr. Lall Seal, the mill-maire, who has risen within the recollection of the present generation from absolute poverty to great wealth, is about to found a College, for 500 Hindoo youth, and to place the Jesuits at the head of it.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1.

The India Steamer arrived at Madras on Thursday evening the 16th, having been about five days and a half from the Sand Heads. She took the ground on the Palicat shore. Her cabin, with one exception, was not occupied.

The last Deity states, that the Afghans are threatening the valley of Slat, which we transferred to the Rajah of Kohat. There is every probability that they will occupy it, for the Rajah can oppose no adequate force to them. But it is very unlikely that the British Government will interfere in the smallest degree to restore it to the principality of Kohat.

The Burkess Times, in its last commercial notice, quotes an article from the Manchester Guardian, to the effect that Mr. Robert Peel had determined to admit Brazilian, also grown sugar at 30s. the hundred weight, and to reduce the duty on East India Sugar from 21s. to 16s.

The Star states, that the detention of the Cooly ship mentioned in the Explicator of yesterday, arose from there being some ventilation between decks, the scuttles being all shut, and the officer, paying no attention to the request made to him that they might be opened.

The Rajah Kales Kisen, has sent some of his translations to the King of Holland, as he seems to have done to all the Kings of the earth, is except to the brother of the Sun and the Moon at Pekin. His Majesty has acknowledged the receipt of these; and the Minister of the Belgian Embassy (?) has embraced the occasion to name Rajah Kales Kisen Dabul or his perfect content. A translation of the letter is given in the Star. It is very classical. It begins thus, "The King of the Sun and Lower Continents," &c. Is this the Rajah's own translation?

The Steamer Fris, with the Secretary of Legation, Col. Malcolm, bearing the ratified treaty with China, left Bombay, on the 10th instant, and would probably reach Hong Kong about the first week of March. The Burkess Times censures the Secretary for playing the Polecat, in the short, to the great annoyance of the unscrupulous passengers.

His Excellency Major General Sir William Nett made his grand entry into Lucknow on the 21st of February. The King and all his Court in their magnificent dress, went out to meet the Ruyal. When the party met, Sir William stepped into His Majesty's Howdah, and after the usual embraces, the whole party returned to the Narad-dun Palace, where a sumptuous breakfast was laid out. After justice had been done to the visually, the King and the Ruyal proceeded to the other palace to witness Elephant fights.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India.

ably offer some observations on the subject generally in our next. We think that certain passages of it seem to indicate an intention on the part of the British Government to take measures for the suppression of the Opium trade:—

Foreign Office, January 3, 1848.

To Sir GEORGE LAURENCE, Bart.
SIR.—I am directed by the Earl of Aberdeen to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which you addressed to his Lordship on the 31st December, on behalf of the Committee of the British China Association, requesting to be made acquainted with such provisions of the Treaty signed by Sir Henry Pottinger with the Chinese Plenipotentiaries on the 26th August, as may have reference to the regulation of the future commercial intercourse between this country and China. His Lordship directs me to state to you in reply, that although Her Majesty has been pleased to ratify the Treaty signed by Sir Henry Pottinger, it would be inconsistent with the general practice of the British Government to make known the contents of that Treaty, until Her Majesty's ratification shall have been exchanged against the ratification of the Emperor of China, as the Treaty cannot be considered to be formally concluded until that exchange has taken place.

Lord Aberdeen, however, regrets the loss that he is precluded from giving you officially the information, that you request, the assurance contained in the public prints of the late negotiation in China are substantially correct, and his Lordship desires me to state to you that Her Majesty's Government trust that the stipulations of the Treaty and the arrangements which have yet to be made for giving full effect to it will place the intercourse between the two countries on a satisfactory footing. Her Majesty's Government will spare no exertion to protect and promote the legal trade of Her Majesty's subjects resorting to China; but Her Majesty's Government feel that the advantages which Her Majesty's subjects may derive from the trade with China must, after all, depend in a great measure, on the manner in which that trade shall be conducted by the parties who may engage in it. Her Majesty's Government would therefore call the attention of all such parties to the expediency of improving upon those which they may manage, and the commencement of the new era which is about to open to British trade in China, it is of the utmost importance that the British Government should be made to be the best of friends to the Chinese authorities, and people should, as far as possible, be respected, and that every endeavor should be made to conciliate the good will of the inhabitants of the country, and to identify them with a favorable opinion of the British character. I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BIBLE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR.—In your remarks upon the resolution of the Committee of the Auxiliary Bible Society, regarding the spilling of the name of Jesus, putting aside the specific question discussed in the Committee's paper published by you, you object to the course pursued both by the Auxiliary and the Parent Society in this country in relation to the principles advocated in the masterly paper put forth by the Auxiliary, you have not touched, and therefore it may be assumed you have no objections to the spelling proposed; but the general question, whether the Bible Society is bound to publish translations of the Scriptures of which they cannot approve is the one you have taken up. As this is a question of much importance, and as the members of the Bible Committee generally differ from you, I hope you will in fairness permit me to make a few remarks of the subject. A candid and honest discussion of the principles involved in the question would, I am persuaded, tend to remove much misunderstanding, and to disseminate more correct views regarding such matters. The articles and speeches which I have read condemnatory of the course which the Bible Society have consistently pursued in this matter are more distinguished for a display of party feeling than for a calm and dispassionate discussion of the principles involved in the question at issue; indeed I have not yet met with a single writer on the other side, who has attempted to grapple with the real difficulties of the question. The simple question directed at all the objections in which it has been too often involved, is, have not the Committee of the Bible Society a right to refuse to publish at the expense of the Society, any translation of the Scriptures, with which they are not satisfied?

The views which you and those who agree with you, advocate, seem to go the length of asserting that the Committee of the Bible Society are bound to publish any or every version of the Scriptures offered them on the responsibility of the translator.

If this position be correct in principle, it is both proper and expedient in practice.—Let us see then what it would involve, according to this view, the Society are bound to publish a Unitarian version, a Roman Catholic version, or an Arian version of the Scriptures. That is, they would be bound to publish versions of the word of God, which they believe to be subversive of religion, and opposed to truth. But I may be told that the principles you maintain do not imply so much, and that you would not go the length of sanctioning the publication of such versions of the Scriptures by the Bible Society. Be it so, where then is the line of distinction to be drawn, where is the boundary to be fixed between truth and error? And if this be fixed, and if the general principles upon which every version ought to be made (no easy matter by the way) be defined who are to determine whether any particular version be conformable to such principles? Who are the judges in this case? There are two parties concerned; the Committee and the translator. If the translator be the judge, of course he will judge favorably of his own version, whatever vagaries or errors it may contain, and the Bible Society would become the publishing "agency" of the translator, and the medium through which the credulous, not to say positive errors, of all kinds of translators, are scattered abroad.

Could any number of pious and upright men be found to act on such a Committee? Would men of conscience thus consent not only to become the publishing "agency" of every translator, but willingly lend themselves to disseminate what they believed to be error? If it may be said, the Committee should not be required to publish positive errors at the bidding of every translator. The question here recurs. Who are the judges in this matter. If the Society at whose expense and with whose sanction a translation of the Scriptures is published, may not through its officials, judge of the correctness of such translation, who may or who ought? As to how far a Committee ought to proceed in pronouncing upon the correctness of a translation, is a question of degree, but even here the Committee are the only judges, (so long as they act in union with the views of the Society which they represent,) as to what they consider erroneous or otherwise. If they are not the proper judges of even this subordinate question, I shall feel much obliged by your pointing out who are or who ought to be! It is true, that the Committee of the Bible Society, like all other bodies of men are liable to error, but such liability accidentally does not take away their right of determining what they ought to sanction or not, with the funds and imprimatur of the Bible Society.

The Bible Society was formed for the purpose of disseminating the pure word of God in various languages; to carry on their operations it appoints a committee of its members, it is the duty of this committee to see that the funds are properly expended, i. e. in the dissemination of the pure word of God; who is to judge in this case if the parties who are appointed to this important office are not?

Whether a committee judges correctly in any specific given case, is a different question—it is one which ought to be discussed on its own independent merits. I have not touched on any specific case, because you seem to me to drag the right in general of the committee to judge in any case, and I have purposely avoided the specific case, regarding Barrington, because although you have the rare merit of being collected and cool on most subjects, you seem very apt to get into hot water by the least approach to this. In conclusion, let me propose for your consideration the following case:—A translator presents a version of the Scriptures to the Committee of the Bible Society that has Committee a right to examine into the fidelity of such a version and into its conformity with the principles of the Society? If such right be confined within certain limits, what are those limits and who are to fix them? The translator or the Society is represented by the Committee? An honest and candid discussion of this subject will, I am persuaded, be acceptable to many of your readers, and I shall be happy to see some light thrown upon it by those who like yourself seem to deny the right of the Bible Committee to determine what versions they ought or ought not to patronize.

C. L. H. STUDIES.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR.—The proposal you bring forward in your paper of the 23d February, for adopting the Oordoo and Bengalee Dialects as the two languages in which students of the College of Fort William shall be required to qualify themselves, to the exclusion of Persian and Hindoo, has much force of reason, in as much as the two languages you advocate are undoubtedly spoken by large masses of our subjects. But I think the public has not (whatever the Government may have) sufficient information before them to enable them to form a safe judgment on this question. Supposing then, that our Rules are no better informed than ourselves, (a very reasonable supposition and universally adopted now-a-days—especially by the newspapers,) I would suggest to them to consider and be fully informed on the following points, before important changes are attempted.

1st. The Oordoo language admits of many varieties. That of Muniri no doubt differs much from that of Agra—both differ from that of Gorakhpore. Again, that which is used in the Courts is full of the "expolished Persian," in fact is almost made up of words of this language, with little more than a few Verbo and Participle (Hindustanee). It is also unintelligible to the very great majority of Hindoos who live beyond five miles from cities and large stations.

2nd. The Bengalee language also is (as may be ascertained by looking at any Magistrate or Collector's Ishtikhar in the Government's Diaries) composed in the proportion of about four-fifths of Persian Verboles.

3rd. The Persian, as appears from what I have stated above, enters considerably into the formation of common Oordoo and Bengalee; and almost entirely constitutes the Official Oordoo.

4th. The Hindoo is spoken and written (in the Nagree character) almost exclusively by all Hindoos and many Mohammedans, who live at any distance from cities and large stations; i. e. in fact, and not the Hindoostanee or Urdu, is the great popular dialect of the mass of our subjects in Upper Hindoostan.

If the above four suggestions have any good foundation, then it becomes pretty evident, that the languages to be desired in a Civilian required for employment in the Upper Provinces are decidedly Persian and Hindoo—inasmuch as the latter is the language of the great number and the most interesting (and interlocutory) portion of the population—the former is extremely useful and almost indispensable for official purposes—and both together go to form the Ordo, the varieties of the dialect of which will offer no difficulty to one acquainted with its constituent parts.

And again, for a Civilian in Bengal, the Persian and Bengalee seem the most desirable. About the latter there can of course be no dispute, the latter, in spite of all the "expolished" appears to hold its ground in practice (and very naturally) in all official matters, and it is desirable for qualifying the Civilian to speak with respectability to the Mahomedans.

San Oniah and population of towns, and for enabling him to avoid those liabilities even which are accidentally committed by more Bengalee scholars.

Your Obedient-Bengalee Scheme has certainly the merit of simplicity, and would no doubt be very acceptable to the Teachers and Examiners of the College of Fort William, as well as to the Students, as students—but I hope I may venture, without being charged with bigotry, to doubt its efficiency in turning out Civilians well qualified as to languages. It might answer well enough for Bengal, but for the Upper Provinces it appears decidedly objectionable. What is the use of teaching Bengalee to a man who is to administer affairs for 20 or 30 years in the Agra Presidency? It may be answered in order to qualify him also for employment in Bengal, should Government require his services there. But this surely is a very laborious and clumsy way of answering the purpose. As to the neglect of the study of Bengalee in the College, Government undoubtedly has the power of rectifying that without burdening more than half the service with useless studies and depriving them at the same time of such knowledge as is really useful. However, whichever system is the best, one thing is evident, that Government ought to make it clear, that in selecting they are guided by the opinions of men who are qualified, by their acquirements, by their practical acquaintance with the various headings of the subject, and by the largeness and impartiality of their views, to form a sound judgment on this important subject. Men not in any way likely to raise the cry of "Nothing like Leather."

The public has yet no grounds for knowing through the medium of its organs the News-papers, that their rulers have taken these preliminary steps, therefore said Public bites the Thumb nail of reflection with the Teeth of dubitation in the person of its humble representative.

GOADAKER.

PUNJABI.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—Don't you think that the Anti-Puseyite extracts which you give in your paper of yesterday's date have a great tendency, under pretence of attacking Puseyism, which is very unpopular in India, though it may not be the worst religion in the world for all that, to throw odium on the prelatists of the Church of England. I question if there is a sentiment in the circular to the Parishioners of Christ Church Hoxon (headed Puseyite activity) that says nine out of an hundred Anglicans are not taught from their cradle to believe—and with respect to the extract headed a "Puseyite Church is a new thing to call Charles the First a martyr?" for one was always taken to Church on the 30th January, and it was the only Saint's day on which I was—which day you will always find mentioned in the Oxford Almanac, as Charles King and Martyr. It is some years now since Dr. Hook proclaimed in the Chapel Royal that the Church of England boasted the only Royal Martyr in the Calendar. I should be sorry to think that Vindictive's famous picture of him, which I fancy was the original of that that exist—(you will correct me as I am wrong) did not exist till after the Restoration.

OF WE SHOULD INTERFERE ONE OF THE FIRST causes in Woodcock. Is "I. H. C." an error of the Illiterate writer, who so freely caricatures divine and scholars, or of the Compositor? I am aware of the difference between extracts and leading articles, but as you have an high character as the only unbiased Religious Journal in India, and are much esteemed and respected, you should be careful to want affusions from other pens you give your sanction. I give my own, though you will probably consider them very Papiestical initials.

PORT PHILLIP.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—Being desirous of attracting a greater share of attention to the Colony of Port Phillip, which I have lately visited, I propose giving you a sketch of the place, with liberty to insert it in your paper if you think fit to do so.

The climate of Port Phillip is very changeable; the warm weather commences in the middle of October, and last till the middle of March; hot winds from the North occasionally blow for two, three or even four days together in November, December and January, but they are suited in the afternoon by squalls from the South, which, in a few minutes, bring down the thermometer sometimes as much as 30 degrees. These sudden and great changes would seem to be adverse to health, especially in cases in which preservation of an equal temperature of the skin is important; nevertheless the people are healthy and no ill effects appear to result from the sudden transition from heat to cold. October is warm, so are February and March, but the atmosphere in these months is cooled by frequent showers which render the weather agreeable. In the remaining months a great deal of rain falls and the weather is most delightful. Great travellers (such as I am) have told me that no part of the world have they derived so much pleasure from the atmosphere as they have from the pure and exhilarating air of Australia. There are several frosty nights in the year and not above three or four in which blankets are superfluous. Persons in Port Phillip who have been in America, sense the climate of the former to be far superior to that of the United States or Canada. The heat of its summer though longer, is not worse than that of New York and in Australia there is no real winter. On the whole, though Port Phillip is not the Paradise which the Emigration Agents describe it to be, still, taking the climate from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, I do not suppose that it is excelled by that of any country in the world.

For agriculture Port Phillip is unquestionably the best part of Australia; there is some land of the best and most fertile description; there is a fair proportion of useful land, and some which is absolutely worthless. The Western Port District (see the map) is generally bad and swampy from Wilson's promontory to Melbourne. The land around Melbourne and extending to Geelong on the East is generally of second quality; it is an indurated clay formation of considerable thickness resting on lime-stone. This is elevated into ranges at Geelong where there is good land extending at intervals to Portland Bay. Behind Cape Northumberland near Portland Bay there are thousands of acres of land of the finest quality fit for plough. The newly discovered country, Gipps's Land, is highly spoken of and has the advantage of being well watered. Moreover a harbour, "Port Allert," has been found in it which is suitable for coaling vessels. Generally speaking the Port Phillip District is healthy, fertile, and much land is at present waste. On this account the beautiful lime-stone dunes, between Geelong and the Heads, at the entrance of the Port Phillip Bay, are at present unoccupied from want of water, as the Population increases and labour becomes cheaper walls and tanks will be made to supply this necessary of life. The minimum Government price of land not within five miles of certain localities is 12 per acre.

As a grazing country the District of Port Phillip is perhaps unequalled. However, cattle and sheep thrive there wonderfully. The horses fed on grass do work which no grass-fed horses in England could do. The sheep and oxen are beautifully fat and it is acknowledged, that better grass-fed meat is killed in Melbourne, than is to be seen, grass-fed, in London.

Agriculture is advancing rapidly in Port Phillip. Wheat, oats, barley and tobacco are cultivated with success. Hops are now being tried. The fly which infests the Hop vines in England, and is often so destructive as to rid producers of their rendering. Hops are article of much speculation, there is, unknown in Port Phillip, and there is every prospect of this valuable plant being common fully cultivated. There is also probability of wine becoming an article of export. Six vines from the Dijon country (Cote D'Or) arrived at Melbourne a few months ago. They have now 600 acres of land in the Barabool Hills, near Geelong and are sanguine of success. If they succeed they are to be followed by a large party of their friends from Switzerland.

The export of wool from Port Phillip is 1641 amounted to 1,570,331 lbs., and suits are beginning to be exported. Some prepared by the newly-established Melbourne Saling Company was tried in the vessel in which I returned to India, after we had crossed the line, and it was considered by the Captain and all the passengers as broke and finer, far superior to the very good Irish and Dantzic beef which we had on board.

Two miles inland, North of the Port of Port Phillip, which is available for Merchant vessels, but has not sufficient depth of water for an iron ship, stands the Town of Melbourne to which again is conveyed by Lighters up the Yarra Yarra River. Melbourne is a large place, considering that in 1834, it was a Gun team force, without a human being except a few naked savages, it is a truly wonderful place, but from its not being so great an outlet for produce, I do not think that it will ever rival Sydney. It has two Steam Mills and steam boats daily—several Churches, and all the appearance of a growing Town. The houses are generally small, some are built of wood, which must be exported in a new place where labour has been very high, but there are many fine houses and some few as good as in any Provincial Town in England. It stands on 800 acres as sold off by Government, and with its suburbs has a population of not less than 8000 and perhaps as many as 10,000 persons. The Town is disagreeable and generally either dusty or muddy—without sewers and drains and the streets are full of holes. It is also unhealthy and will I suppose be much properly drained, being very crowded from the quantity of land put into the market by the Government, being very small. The minimum Government price of land in the Township of Melbourne has been raised to 5000 per half-acre. The allotments are of 1/4 an acre each and the land sales take place at long intervals determined by the Government. First rate business situations have been resold at enormous prices, and the price of the very few new built on may be quoted at 204 per foot of frontage—with a depth of 80 or 100 feet. There some allotments were bought in 1837 at from 50 to 100 per half acre. No available mineral wealth has been as yet discovered.

There is a splendid coal mine at Cape Liptrap about 18 miles East of Cape Woolmain (the Eastern Entrance of Western Port) but it is at present useless, as there is no anchorage and no ship would dare to be embayed off so dangerous a coast, with a constant succession of gales from the South and West, and driving coals 18 miles for unloading at Western Port at the present price of fuel would not pay.

Australia with a population of not more than 150,000 Europeans, convict and free, was some years ago violently excited by the high price of wool, by the large sums sent by the Australian and Union Banks and private individuals, and by the demand for stock in Southern Australia which purchased largely with good English money; stock rose to exorbitant prices and no income of speculation which saw only progressive prosperity and apprehended no fall in the price of wool and no diminution of the influx of capital took possession of the people. Port Phillip was seen to be a fine country and it sprang up like a mushroom. Settlers—many of them men of wealth did not hesitate to extend the accumulated savings of years in the purchase of land, which was as yet yielded them no commensurate return. Sheep and cattle were however, anticipating the sale of their wool and stock at the high prices then prevailing, so join in this fatal system of speculation. The price of wool and therefore of sheep and comquently that of cattle fall, and the engagements, contracted by numbers could not be fulfilled. The sheep and cattle-holders indebted largely to the merchant for stores and advances on wool could not pay their creditors, who in turn could not meet the demands on him and both became involved in difficulties, which overtrading to a great extent had, I may observe, much aggravated. The Banks which had discounted as freely as they could safely do, and indeed with a freeman's injustice to the real capitalist entering the market, as the quantity of paper discounted raised every thing to a fictitious value, of course required greater security as accommodation bills multiplied and risk increased—this at last could not be borne—bankruptcies ensued. Stock and lands were thrown into the market beyond any demand for them. Prices fell to the augmentation of previous difficulties, further bankruptcies followed and the present state of depression under which New South Wales is labouring, is the grievous consequence of the mania.

But the true value of the Colony of Port Phillip is not to be judged of from its present difficulties. Its resources are only now beginning to be developed. It has a climate in which European can live with comfort and in which they multiply exuberantly. It has thousands of acres of fine land unsold in situations available for cultivation. It has soils which in other parts of the world of very similar climate produce excellent wines. It has a million of sheep—many horses and cattle, and can support many more in a state of nature—a sustained population of 25,000 persons cannot perform miracles, but it has worked wonders—its present difficulties will subserve to future advancement, attracting capital with emigrants from other shores, and Port Phillip will, I think, become the chief of the Australian Colonies. The Geelong and Portland Bay Districts, especially, will more be thickly peopled along the coast, and perhaps become the cheapest country in the world—with no taxes—wheat, from Manilla and India—tea from China—meat at 24 per lb. and fruit and vegetables in great abundance.

Your obedient servant,

H. BRADSTREET,
Baptist Civil Servant.

RELIGION.

FURTHER MEANS.—The Oxford Chronicle publishes a circular, addressed, in a printed form, to those members of the clerical body throughout England who are supposed to be favourable to the profligate and unchristian attempt to "superintendence" the Establishment, and headed "Revival of Monastic and Conventual Institutions on a plan adapted to the exigencies of the Reformed Catholic Church in England." The objects of such an institution the circular proceeds to lay down.

"1. To widen and deepen the legitimate influences of the Church; 2. To promote and conduct Christian education upon Christian principles; 3. To afford a refuge for the contrite and the erring, the destitute, and the straitened; 4. To cherish a spirit of devotion, charity, humility, and obedience; 5. To give better opportunities of acquiring self-knowledge, and exercising piety; 6. To promote simplicity and godly sincerity in the intercourse of life; 7. To revive piety and self denial in diet, dress, furniture, personal attendance, &c.; 8. To form habits of retirement, silence, and recollection.

THE MEANS.

"1. A system by which the superabundance of the wealthy may be made service to supply the wants of the poorer members; 2. Daily public devotion, and frequent communion, agreeably to the orders of the Church; 3. Strict observance of the festivals, fasts, &c. prescribed by the Acts of Convocation; 4. A rule for dress, diet, furniture, recreation, &c.; 5. Appointed times for silence and subjects for meditation; 6. Corporal works of mercy; 7. Exercises of penitence and obedience; 8. Bodily and mental discipline, particularly in educating the young, composing works to meet the necessities of the Church, working for the poor, and assisting in the various duties of the Establishment.

There should be "no wars, but a solemn declaration and engagement of obedience to the superior, and of compliance with the rules of the institution during residence." The Oxford Chronicle says that the plan is already in operation at Littlemore, near Oxford; Mr. Newman being the founder and president.—London Mail.

MR. MACKINNON'S SPEECH ON TOWNS' BILL is certainly a greater degree of interest amongst the Dissenting bodies generally than any measure that has been proposed for a long time. They do well to be themselves, for it is the most insidious movement on the part of the clergy that has been made since the passage of the Act. Although his name is attached to it, it is whispered that Mr. Mackinnon is not so much the framer of the proposed Bill as the Bishop of London. Under the process of improving the health of the people, provision is made for securing to the clergymen of every parish, on every interment which may take place, such amount of fees as the Bishop of the diocese shall fix, and this whether or no he perform the funeral service. He may decline the duty, but he is still to secure the fee. In the Hackney Church-rate case, the scale which rules that parish was produced in evidence, and in giving judgment on the case, Dr. Lushington referred to the above clause in the following terms:—"Why that it is palpably an attempt to begin the end with the means." The opinion of the Judge of their own Court should teach the clergy and Mr. Mackinnon to use a moderate degree of discretion in urging their pretensions.

MORNING ADVERTISER.

CINCEA.—Resolutions of the Directors of the London Missionary Society, adopted 26th Dec. 1842.—1. That, with feelings of devout thankfulness to the God of all grace, the Directors of the London Missionary Society review the measures commenced by their honoured fathers, nearly forty years since, and prosecuted with undeviating constancy by their successors in office, for the extension of the blessings of Christianity into the empire of China—with recollections of hallowed pleasure they record the names and labours of Drs. Morrison and Milne, and their faithful coadjutors, amidst great difficulties and discouragements, persevered to the end of their course in their work of faith and labour of love for the salvation of China—with devout satisfaction, they contemplate the accomplishment of that mighty enterprise, derived and principally accomplished by the disinterested and indefatigable Morrison—the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the language of the many millions of that idolatrous empire;—they can but justly appreciate that invaluable production of his persevering literary toil, the Chinese Dictionary, by which the future generations of that distant kingdom have been greatly facilitated; and, finally, with peculiar pleasure, the Directors reflect, that, in the later years of the Society's operations, (guided and stimulated by the example of their predecessors,) the gratifying duty has been assigned to themselves of sending forth a goodly band of faithful Missionaries, who, by labours and suffering apostles, are now qualified to make known to the Chinese, in their own tongue, the wonderful works of God.

2. That, reviewing these protracted preparatory labours, sustained by humble hope and persevering prayer, the Directors cannot but rejoice the church of Christ throughout the world, and the friends of the London Missionary Society in particular, to unite in grateful adoration to the God of Missions for the termination of war with China, and for the greatly enlarged facilities secured by the Treaty of Peace, for the introduction of the multiplied advantages and spiritual blessings of Christianity into vast and populous regions, sealed for past ages against the servants of the only true God, and for the bright prospects presented for the consummation of the ultimate conversion of China to the faith of Christ.

3. That, impelled by a sense of the additional obligations thus imposed by the providence of God, the Directors solemnly engage themselves to employ all practicable means for increasing the strength and efficiency of their Chinese Missions; and for adding to the number of the labourers already in the field; fully conscious that the gratifying duty will be facilitated by the unanimous concurrence of the Society's friends, and generously sustained by their zeal, liberality, and prayers.

In accordance with the sentiments thus deliberately expressed, the Directors have already adopted measures for the removal of the Anglo-Chinese College from Malacca, (distant about fifteen hundred miles from China) to the Island of Hong Kong. To that station the printing presses and various Missionary apparatus will also be transferred; while a part of our Missionary brethren will be located on the island, and the remainder will proceed to such of the Chinese cities, opened for commerce by the treaty of peace, as may appear most eligible.

The Directors, however, are not only anxious that the brethren already in the field should be supplied with the greatest measure of efficiency, but be enabled to the inadequacy of their present resources to meet the ongoing progress, they have determined to adopt the most necessary for similar work, during the ensuing two years, two or twelve additional Missionaries for China, with a view of entering upon stations which the present limited number must have unsurpassed.

In adopting these practical measures, which will fall far short of the urgency of the occasion, the Directors cast themselves with confidence on the generous support of the Society's faithful friends. The members of the London body for several years exceeded its receipts, and the only required in strengthening and extending the Chinese Missions will involve a very considerable increase. Yet the Directors cannot apprehend from their constituents the charge of imprudence or presumption, although they may concede that transcending the precise rules of arithmetical calculation; on the contrary, they have for several years, or had they done less for an object of such magnitude, they would have dreaded the charge of coldness and apathy at a moment when ardour and zeal were justly demanded.

A Special Subscription, to meet the enlarged and unaccountable expenditure contemplated, has already been commenced, in which the Directors most earnestly invite the liberal contributions of their friends; they intend to adopt forthwith the best means for presenting the claims of China to the Christian public in the metropolis and throughout the country; and have been praying in His whose glorious kingdom they are anxious to extend, they anticipate the support of His willing people, and the sanction of His Holy Spirit.

—FET. DIOPHANTUS' ARITHMETICS.—We have already announced the decease of this great scholar, who, for the last thirty years, has enjoyed an untarnished reputation as the fertile prince of Hebrew philologists. The following brief notice of his writings will probably be acceptable to many of our readers: we translate it from the Savonar.

The celebrated Hebraist, Gesenius, Professor of Theology at Halle, has died at the age of fifty-six. It is to this learned man, pre-eminently, that the study of Hebrew owes the new start which it has taken in Germany during the last thirty years. He is the Author of a great grammar of the Hebrew language, of a history of the Hebrew language and writings, of a Dictionary, originally published in two volumes, and since enlarged in 1836, in which it has reached a fourth edition, and, finally, of a small elementary Grammar, which appeared in 1813, and of which the thirteenth edition has seen the light in the course of the present year. This is the Grammar, which, in Germany, is generally used in the upper classes of the gymnasium. To replace his first Dictionary in two volumes, Gesenius had commenced, in 1836, the publication of a Thesaurus Lingue Hebraice in quarto. The first part of the third and last volume of this great work appeared a few months ago. Gesenius is also the Author of a Commentary on Isaiah, in three volumes, in which he warmly disputes the authenticity of several portions of the book contained in the Bible under the name of that Prophet, and especially all the second part from chapter 41, to chapter 55. He had brought under a learned investigation the Samaritan Pentateuch; and his last studies were employed upon the monuments of the Phœnician language.

As a Hebraist, Gesenius had for a long time enjoyed an almost exclusive authority; but, for the last ten years, a new grammatical system, that of Ewald, has come into rivalry with him, and, disapproved with him the pre-eminence. However, this competition has been confined to the sphere of erudition and the higher class of teaching; in the sphere of elementary studies, he had brought under a learned investigation the Samaritan Pentateuch; and his last studies were employed upon the monuments of the Phœnician language.

As a theologian, Gesenius belonged to the Rationalist school, of which he was one of the principal representatives. The attacks, not simply bold in spirit, but of an unworthy character in the form of his lectures, he was accustomed to make upon certain narratives of the Old Testament, drew down upon him, in 1828, some severe attacks in the Berlin Magazine &c. Since the appearance of these articles, which were directed at once against him and his colleague Weachter, and which raised in Germany a warm discussion of the right of Rationalism to occupy the chair of Divinity in Halle, the Gesenius became more reserved. Although, at Halle, the influence of Rationalism has almost entirely ceased, Gesenius continued to adhere to his system, and was a strenuous, while Wegscheider, formerly his rival as well as his friend, had now no more than some fifteen pupils. Gesenius was still labouring in the month of July last. About the same time he had the pleasure of welcoming his friend De Wette, and of offering him the occasion of making a noble declaration in favour of historical Christianity. He was not destined to see the recommencement of the course of his studies.

Every article purchased through this Agency will be most minutely examined previous to its being packed and the same care under every circumstance, taken, as if persons were themselves individually present and superintending. Packages of a large size will, as usual, be shipped by six vessels to India; but those of smaller dimensions, will (unless otherwise instructed) be sent through the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Mail; and thus enabling persons in most instances to receive their orders fully executed within four months from the date of the transmission of their instructions. In transactions of a complicated or confidential nature a firm recommendation, according to circumstances, will be expected in those of the ordinary nature of Agency Business, the Commission will be regulated by the customary rates; and for the selection, purchase and shipment of goods, a Commission of 6 per cent. on the gross amount will be charged.

Letters to the address of Mr. PARKER PITTAR, EUROPEAN AND ORIENTAL AGENCY OFFICE, LONDON, will meet with the most prompt attention. Reference in Calcutta, Mr. L. E. Bayly, Esq. of the firm of Messrs. Laithey, Brothers and Co.

PROSPECTUS.

IT is proposed to publish, by subscription, a work in Eight Books, entitled, "THE PARADISE OF THE INVISIBLE WORLD."

By W. ROBINSON, Baptist Ministry.
 The Work treats on the state of disembodied souls, both that of the saved, and that of the lost; but chiefly on the state of happy souls.

It is a commonly received opinion among Protestants, that disembodied souls go as one to Heaven or Hell; but this opinion appears to me, and to the author among others, to be unsupported by Scripture. The doctrine taught in Scripture seems to be that of an intermediate state; not a purgatory, nor a state of probation; but a state of rest and happiness for the righteous, and a state of misery for the wicked; while Heaven and Hell seem reserved till after the resurrection and the judgment. The first chapter of the work enters Heaven till they all enter it together at the invitation "I Come ye blessed of my Father," see the wicked, Heaven till they all enter it together, when the Great Judge shall say: "Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire," &c.

The arguments in favour of an intermediate state, and replies to the objections usually brought against that state are limited to the Second Book; so that those, who differ in opinion from the author, may, it is believed, read the other parts of the work without feeling any thing material different from their own views of the state of departed souls.

The author is quite ready to acknowledge, that the doctrine of an intermediate state is a speculative; and he has treated it as such; but as truth is preferable to error, even in non-essential, he has thought the subject worth his attention; to be laid before the Christian-Reader for their consideration; and he hopes, that his manner of handling it will not inflict the least wound on the feelings of those, who are of another mind.

The advocacy of this doctrine was but a part, and that not even the main part of the object, which the author proposed to himself; his object was that of calling the attention of non-believers to the great concerns of another world, and thus promoting their spirituality of mind; and he ventures to hope, that his hope is corroborated by the testimony of a few plain Christians, that have seen the whole manuscript or parts of it, that the serious reader will not pursue the work without some spiritual advantage.

* The work will be printed in Demy 8vo. and will contain about 400 pages. Price bound in cloth 6 Rupees.

Persons desirous of subscribing to the work are requested to send their names and addresses to the Rev. J. TOWN, Baptist Mission Press, or to the Serampore Press, or to Mr. JOHN ROBINSON, at Serampore.

ABOLITION OF THE LOTTERIES.—We are happy to learn that the Government of Bengal has at length resolved to abolish the state Lotteries. The question was placed by previous discussions in such a position that the final discontinuance of the Lottery could not be effected without positive instructions from the home authorities. But the Government of Bengal has had sufficient evidence of the pernicious effects of the public lotteries, by the encouragement they gave to a spirit of gambling in the community, and to the formation of idle and dissipated habits, to feel justified in at once suspending them, pending reference to the Court of Directors. Unless therefore the Court should send out peremptory orders to revive them, the last Lottery will be emphatically the last, and society will be delivered altogether from this pest. This resolution possesses the greater merit inasmuch as it has been adopted at a time when lotteries, under the able management of 'opt. Hylah, had become unusually profitable. The sacrifice of revenue which the Government has makes to the public interests of the community, does not fall short of a lakh of Rupees a year. In common with every well-wisher of the country we rejoice at the manly determination which has been adopted; but we are also not without our own particular source of gratification. We had occasion lately to observe that the local authorities had generally taken the lead in those measures which have conferred real benefits on the country; and that to the authorities in England had been left the agreeable duty of giving them the stamp of their authority. The present movement affords another corroboration of this fact.

We cannot for a moment suppose, that when the Lotteries have been once suspended, the Court of Directors will dream of restoring them to life and activity. They will, we are confident, need no stimulus from Her Majesty's Ministers on such an occasion. If any such stimulus is required, a Cabinet, of which the Earl of Ripon, who abolished the lotteries in England—is a member, will not hesitate to apply it. But we do the Court great injustice by indulging even the remotest suspicion that they will fail to support Mr. Bird in this salutary measure. We look however for more than a cold assent to the abolition in Leadenhall Street. We trust the Court will send out positive instructions to prevent by a legislative enactment, the projection of private lotteries. Unless prohibited by law, the spirit of gambling will find vent in the establishment of private lotteries. At the time when state lotteries were abolished by Act of Parliament, a statute had been in force for more than a hundred years, which declared all lotteries public nuisances, and imposed a penalty of 500l. on every proprietor of a private lottery and 20l. on each adventurer. When therefore Parliament refused to pass the annual Act for the state lotteries, they quire the same protection for the interests of the land, and we trust that the present measure will be consummated by an Act, declaring all lotteries public nuisances and imposing a penalty on the projectors.

THE NEW LAW RESPECTING THE SITTINGS OF THE SADDLER COURT.—The Harbours gave us rather a long article in his issue of the 25th of last month in condemnation of the law which has just been enacted regarding the sittings of the Judges in the Saddler Court. He introduces his article by a remark, that two Acts involving great changes in the practice of the Saddler Court have been passed in one day, which is an evidence of that love of novelty which Lord Auckland characterized as a radical vice in Indian legislation. It is somewhat singular that one of these Acts was prepared under His Lordship's own eye,—with the view doubtless of affording an illustration of that vice in his own career of legislation. The Harbours then takes a discursive view of the changes which have been made in the fiscal arrangements of Government, and in the department of Criminal Justice, but we have failed to discover any possible connection between these changes and the Act under discussion. He then proceeds to affirm that "every meddling official, who is alone doing his own work, aims at distinguishing himself by proposing some alteration in the existing system." Not knowing which of the functionaries of Government this complaint is intended to fit, we are unable to appreciate its accuracy. The article proceeds to assert that "drafts of Acts are seen in every issue of the Calcutta Gazette, and though many of them got stilled from want of the genial warmth of authority, not a few are duly hatched to the great delight of the chattering parrots." We have had the curiosity to examine the pages of the Calcutta Gazette, and find that the number of Acts proposed during the last year in reference to this Presidency amount only to 23 of which not a fourth remain as yet under consideration. We find moreover that all the Acts passed by the Legislative Council during the last ten years for eighty millions of people, fall far short of the statutes of a single Session of the Imperial Parliament.

Our contemporary having told us that the new Act involves great changes, proceeds to exemplify the assertion by stating that the only change effected by the new Act is in bringing back the practice of the Court to the rule which was established in 1810, and which was laid aside four years after, and has been resumed after the lapse of thirty years; and that the difference between the old and the new practice is simply that a case must be heard by three judges sitting together, instead of being sent from judge to judge in quest of a majority. This is plain fact; only we find it somewhat difficult to discover wherein the great ness of this small change lies. When our contemporary goes on to affirm that "the object of these several mutations has ever and solely been to save a private lottery and 20l. on each adventurer," it is very possible that he may be referring to economy of time, and indeed this interpretation is supported by the next sentence in which he says, "we remark a desire to prevent a waste of the time of any single judge." And if our contemporary had looked a little more closely into the matter, perhaps he would also have found reason to commend the arrangement for lessening its effects of the time of the suitors, as well as of the judge. It must be self-evident that a suitor who has his cause finally decided before three judges sitting together, will be a gainer in point of time over the suitor who has the same cause to plead at three distinct periods before three several judges.

Our contemporary farther observes, that "it might be supposed that the new Act provided for a medium between the merely economical, and the public satisfaction system," but the remarks on this subject which stretch through two paragraphs do not appear even in his own opinion to be altogether germane to the matter in hand, for we find him informing his readers after having got through three fourths of the article, that he had now come to "that feature of the new law which is peculiar to it." We need not therefore stop to examine how far the Act provides this "medium between the merely economical and the public satisfaction system," but will pass at once to "the peculiar features" of the new Act. On this ground however we have little to add to the remarks we offered in June last, when the draft of the Act was originally published.

It is a rule in the Sudder Adawlat, the Court of final appeal at this Presidency, that no decision of an inferior Court can be reversed except by the concurrence of two Judges. It has been the practice of the Court therefore, whenever a single Judge hearing an appeal saw reason to upset a decree of a lower tribunal, for him to hear the case and record his opinion, and then to make it over for a re-hearing to a second Judge. If he failed to agree in every particular with the decision of the first Judge, it was referred to a third. It frequently happened that the third Judge differed from the other two, and it then went before a fourth. The Harbours states, that a suit has thus been actually heard in suspension before seven Judges,—to which we may add, and without any satisfactory result; in as much as all the seven differed in some one point from each other, and the cause, after having made the circuit of the bench in Calcutta, was sent up to the bench at Allahabad.

The absurdity of this course of procedure is so very manifest, as to make any attempt to expose it almost redundant. Still we may mention among the most prominent disadvantages it entails, that it subjects the suitor to the needless expense and vexation of repeated hearings of the same matter, while it gives him no satisfactory decision as the result of such an outlay of money, patience and time. It is also in most cases a needless waste of the time of the Court. If the Judges had originally conjoined together on the subject, there is every reason to and that the discrepancies of opinion which rendered these repeated references necessary, would have been at once removed. It is no small objection to the old system that it deprived the Judges of the benefit of that mutual consultation, by which the ends of justice are most speedily and effectually promoted. It is a still greater objection that it stripped the decree itself of that weight of authority which a decision delivered by a full bench must necessarily possess. Without intending the slightest disrespect to the Judges who preside in the Sadar, we are still bound to say that its decrees do not enjoy the confidence of the community to the extent they formerly did. This calamity we attribute in a great measure to the vicious practice which has grown up of late years, and which it is the object of the present enactment to correct.

That enactment provides that whenever a single Judge finds himself disposed to reverse or alter the judgment of the Court below, he shall call in two other Judges, and that the case shall be heard by the three sitting together, and be decided by them without any additional voices. The inconveniences which grow out of the present practice will be in a great measure cured by this law. The time, money, and patience of suitors will be saved; the time of the Judges will be economized; the Judges will enjoy the benefit of mutual advice; their decisions will carry weight with the law-loving public; and the general character of the Court will be raised in public estimation.

Our contemporary states, that the impression which the sittings of three Judges will create on the minds of the public, will not be favourable—that the change is most useless one;—and that, considered in another point of view, it may prove no better than a solemn farce. With all reasonable deference for his opinion, we venture not only to differ from him, but to affirm that if he will sit in consultation with us on the subject in the same manner as the Judges of the Sadar Court are required to do by the new law, we are confident he will come over to our opinion within an hour; and instead of thinking that the "single merit of this law is that it does not introduce a worse practice than what has hitherto obtained," he will pronounce that its singular merit is that it introduces a better practice than has hitherto been in vogue.

Small's College.—The past week has been rendered memorable by two very unusual events: the purchase of the Theatre,* and the establishment of a College in Calcutta by a wealthy Native, Baboo Mootoo Lall Seal. The College is placed under the superintendence of the Jesuits. The number of pupils is to be limited for the present to Five Hundred. The sudden appearance of an Institution of such magnitude takes the mind so completely by surprise, that we scarcely know how to allude to it in language which shall not be mistaken for indifference to Native improvement. We rejoice to find that a Native who has risen from absolute poverty to the possession of great wealth, within the memory of the present generation, has chalked out for himself a new path to distinction, in which personal glory and public advantage are so happily blended. Mootoo Baboo, the Rothachild of Calcutta, had previously earned the gratitude of society by devoting 25,000 Rupees to the support of decayed families in Calcutta, and by offering 10,000 Rs. as a prize to the first Hindoo who should marry a widow. These acts of munificence prove that while the Baboo has been accumulating a fortune by his association with Europeans, he has not failed to imbibe some portion of their utilitarian spirit, and has gone far ahead of his countrymen in the wise distribution of his wealth. But the adoption of so ambitious a project as that of founding a College appeared to require some stronger motive than even the national love of fame; and we were at a loss to account for this new direction of the Baboo's exertions till we opened the Native papers of the week. We there discovered that a son of Mootoo Lall, who attends the Hindoo College, had been put in the corner for idleness or disobedience, and that this punishment so deeply affected the father, that he resolved to have a College of his own, which should eclipse the other, and in which his son should not be exposed to such ignominious treatment. The establishment of this new College affords another exemplification of the common remark, that many of the most signal benefits enjoyed by the family of man, have sprung from the most trivial and apparently inadequate causes. Who could have ventured to predict, when he saw the young Seal standing in the corner, that this circumstance would lead to the establishment of a new College, where five hundred youths would be rescued from ignorance and vice, and brought within the circle of European instruction?

But we will not quarrel with the motives which induced the Baboo to organize this new Institution. We will rejoice in the fact that the Natives of the country are beginning to turn their money into a more useful channel than that of idle marriages and funeral feasts, and extravagant peojahs. The College now established will do good, as long as it exists. It will impart instruction to those who lack it, and diminish the strength of superstition. The Banaskar, the Editor of which conducts his journal with undiminished vigor, though caged in the big jail, expresses a doubt as to the continuance of the Institution. "It is matter of doubt, says he, whether the College will last. This however is a future consideration. The work the Baboo undertook through competition, he has accomplished. What need is there to anticipate what may hereafter happen?" Looking to the motives which led to its establishment, we may be permitted, without any breach of charity, to reason against its stability. If the founder had devoted a large sum of money to this object, and invested it in the public funds, in the hands of trustees for the perpetual endowment of such an establishment, there might have been some reasonable hope of its continuance, not only during his life, but after his wealth has descended to his sons. But a momentary impulse of veneration is scarcely a sufficient foundation for a permanent institution. We fear he is likely to cool upon the project, and gradually relax in his zeal till the College sinks into oblivion. We shall be rejoiced to hear that these fears have been removed, and that he has adopted those measures which alone can give the Seal's College a place among the permanent institutions of the Metropolis.

Jessore Grievances.—A letter, which will be found among our Correspondence, informs us that a meeting has just been held in Jessore, with the view of furnishing Mr. George Thompson with accurate information of the state of the district, and a catalogue of the grievances under which it is labouring. It originated with Baboo Kasheshur Mitter, the Mooniff of Suleah, who is represented as having delivered a long speech in which he extolled the "philanthropy, benevolence and love" of Mr. Thompson, and described the oppressions to which the people were subject. Two hundred natives were present; and some boat full of ryots exposed to the meeting a number of grievances, which it was resolved to embody in a memorial, and communicate to Mr. Thompson. A Committee of fifteen was appointed to draw it up.

The grievances of this district, as far as we can judge from the general view of them furnished by our correspondent, are of a very miscellaneous character. The ryots indeed appear to suffer from every class of men, and from the power of injuring them. Government oppresses them with its Dooms Cancon, which means the Canon of Resumptions. The Zemindar crushes them with the Huytam Cancon, which gives him the power of distraint when the ryot refuses to pay his rent; which is sometimes the case. The Indigo planters, with their various detachments of club men, destroy the peace of the ryots; and the Darogah or Police officers subject them to the most grievous oppression. It is somewhat singular that this list of grievances should not include those which the Natives are said to suffer from the venality and extortion of the Native officers of the Civil Courts. This may be only an omission on the part of our correspondent; or the meeting may have felt disinclined to touch upon this particular evil, out of delicacy to the Governor, who is himself one of the Judicial officers of Government.

We shall be most happy to see this memorial of Jessore grievances. We trust the Committee appointed to draw it up will not confine themselves to unmeaning generalities, which make us none the wiser, for we already know that "at power is every where, and at all times abused," and that India is certainly no exception to the general rule. The Zemindar sells up a tenant who will not pay him rent and gives his land to others; the Duke of Newcastle ousts a tenant who will not vote for his candidate; and the Leicestershire gentry, as we learn by the last mail, are ejecting every tenant who goes to the Meeting house. We want a specification of tangible, remediable grievances; and we hope the Committee will not disappoint us. Our correspondent tells us that this meeting for the exposition of grievances is a bold one; a fact we are not much disposed to question. We hope the members will take the still bolder step of pointing to those specific instances of oppression which shall enable the public and the Government at once to rectify their errors. One very fruitful cause of public misery in India, is the want of moral courage in the lower classes; and this is quite as injurious as the want of moral principle in the upper classes. The reform must begin from below. As soon as the oppressed can summon courage to avail themselves of the means of relief which have been provided by the existing laws, those means and contrivances of Justice will be improved. As soon as they repudiate the universal maxim that "he who would live in the water must not quarrel with the alligator," and boldly resist oppression, they will find the fact of things immediately change for the better. Our legal institutions require great, very great amendments, we are the last to question; but the most perfect institutions must fail to impart to curity to those who have not the courage to avail themselves of them.

* We perceive that some of our contemporaries think that the Theatre has been purchased by the Seal Baboo. We give what we have heard in the most moderate way of the case.

In reference to this district, the memorial of grievances will possess a particular interest from the fact, that while the natives are complaining of the grievous oppression of the Indigo planters, it is only a fortnight since we were informed, that the Superintendent of Police, having proceeded in person to examine its condition, reported that none of the evils under which the people suffered, were to be traced to the Planters. Either the Superintendent must have been grossly misled in his enquiries, or the grievances from this source must be more imaginary than real. The memorial will lead to discussion, and discussion to the discovery of truth.

THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.—We are sorry to have to come a second time under the censure of the Caledonia Christian Intelligencer; but we are minded that a short explanation will set us right with the Editor. In an article published two or three weeks since headed "Scheme for uprooting the Presbyterian Establishment," we gave extracts from late English papers, which disclosed a design on the part of a certain portion of the Episcopalian body, usually known as the High Church party, to root out the Presbyterian form of Church polity in Scotland, and substitute in its stead the Episcopalian ritual. Of course, when we alluded to this design of the Episcopalian body, we referred only to that specific section which was pointed out in the quotations, as having entertained it. Had we supposed that our language could have been misconstrued to signify that the whole body of the Church of England, lay and clerical, evangelical and puseyite, had combined to bring about this change, we should have been more particular in our expressions.

We beg in the most distinct and unequivocal manner to assure the Editor of the Intelligencer that nothing could be further from our intention than to insinuate that either he, or the division of the Church to which he is attached, ever indulged in any such aspirations. It is not to be supposed that they have ever cherished any design hostile to the good men in the Kirk of Scotland, or that the evangelical bond which unites them to their Christian brethren of other sects is not stronger than the episcopal bond, which unites them with the Trinitarians. We by no means are fully aware that those who would root out the Presbyterian establishment in Scotland, would spare the low Church party in England if they ever acquire sufficient strength to render their own views predominant in the Establishment. Whenever the Trinitarians shall have succeeded in re-establishing the Convocation, and obtaining that power in the Church and State, which appears to be their particular aim, the first low will doubtless fall on the Evangelical party, who glory in the Reformation. To have supposed therefore that this party should have been so unwise as to assist in strengthening the hands and furthering the designs of their uncompromising opponents, would have been to betray a want of common sense of which we are almost ashamed to have been thought capable.

The following is the article in the Intelligencer.

"An article on the Scottish Church question which appeared in a recent number of the Friend of India not a little surprised us. The said article is headed 'Scheme for uprooting the Presbyterian Establishment,' and this scheme is said to have been projected by Episcopals. The Editor goes on to observe: 'It would appear that it has long been the policy, and to us appears the aim of the Episcopals in Scotland, to get rid of the Presbyterian form of Church polity, and to substitute in its stead the Episcopalian form of Church polity, and to substitute in its stead the Episcopalian ritual. Of course, when we alluded to this design of the Episcopalian body, we referred only to that specific section which was pointed out in the quotations, as having entertained it. Had we supposed that our language could have been misconstrued to signify that the whole body of the Church of England, lay and clerical, evangelical and puseyite, had combined to bring about this change, we should have been more particular in our expressions.' We beg in the most distinct and unequivocal manner to assure the Editor of the Intelligencer that nothing could be further from our intention than to insinuate that either he, or the division of the Church to which he is attached, ever indulged in any such aspirations. It is not to be supposed that they have ever cherished any design hostile to the good men in the Kirk of Scotland, or that the evangelical bond which unites them to their Christian brethren of other sects is not stronger than the episcopal bond, which unites them with the Trinitarians. We by no means are fully aware that those who would root out the Presbyterian establishment in Scotland, would spare the low Church party in England if they ever acquire sufficient strength to render their own views predominant in the Establishment. Whenever the Trinitarians shall have succeeded in re-establishing the Convocation, and obtaining that power in the Church and State, which appears to be their particular aim, the first low will doubtless fall on the Evangelical party, who glory in the Reformation. To have supposed therefore that this party should have been so unwise as to assist in strengthening the hands and furthering the designs of their uncompromising opponents, would have been to betray a want of common sense of which we are almost ashamed to have been thought capable."

contending parties. What some Churchmen may have done as individuals we know not; neither is it at all relevant to the question. But supposing some of them to have done as the Friend says, the whole body of Episcopals are not chargeable on that account. What we mean is, that the Friend of India says, were we to assert that, because some Churchmen have manifested violent opposition to the Church, as it is, in its existing form, the whole body are actuated by a desire to uproot the Establishment and substitute in its stead the Episcopalian form of Church polity. Would he not fairly deny the ascription and maintain that their dissent arose from principle and because they could not conscientiously conform to the Church as it is? Besides, how often have we observed the Friend of India reprimanding his contemporaries that motives are not within their province and that they have no right to judge those of their opponents? And yet when it suits the Friend, he can impute the motives of a whole community and give a charge against them which, if anything, he has shown to be entirely unfounded. This we repeat is unfair, and it is unchristian. Hereafter his contemporaries may reply "Physician heal thyself."

THE COOLY SHIP.—The Franchise Corajoe, which is now dropping down the river with a large cargo of coolies for the Mauritius, was officially visited by the Assistant Emigration Agent, on the 23d of February, who found the scuttles open, and the heat between decks intolerable. Neither cooking places nor privies had been provided for the emigrants, who were grumbling at not having their food. He immediately reported the circumstances to Captain Rogers, the Emigration Agent, adding that he had requested the Chief Mate to have the scuttles opened, but that his request was not complied with, though he remained on board for half an hour. The Agent immediately addressed the owners, Messrs. Rustomjee Cowajee and Co. on the subject, stating that the vessel could not be allowed to proceed on her voyage until this want of attention to the comfort of the Emigrants was explained.

The next day Captain Rogers received a reply from the firm, in which they enclosed certificates from the Chief Mate, denying the statement of the Assistant Agent, and two declarations from the Pilot and the Preventive Officer. At the same time they informed the Agent that unless the ship was allowed to proceed immediately on her voyage, they should hold the Government responsible for all pecuniary loss arising from her detention. The explanation of course, the Chief Mate, Mr. Miller, who is the offending party, is of no value, except as far as it is supported by the evidence of the Pilot and the Preventive Officer, neither of whose statements invalidates the assertions of the Assistant Agent. The Pilot states, that the vessel had been forced by the wind into a position, which required the services of all the officers and crew to clear her. The Preventive Officer states, that the Chief Mate ordered the Fourth officer to open the scuttles, but he does not tell us whether this was done or not. He corroborates the statement that there were no cabins on the 23d, by saying that they were finished on the 24th.

On the same day, the 25th, Captain Rogers sent a reply to Messrs. Rustomjee Cowajee and Co. stating that the case should be submitted to the Government, and that he did not feel at liberty to permit the vessel to proceed to sea with Mr. John Miller as Chief Officer, on whose character Thompson, in reply to an article with which that gentleman had nothing to do, and which had nothing to do with him. We therefore withhold the case was therefore handed up to the letter, and offer a very brief reply to the Deputy Governor. The same day Messrs. Rustomjee and Co. replied to the Emigration Agent, asking him that they would not discharge the Chief Officer, but considered it a protection due to him to continue him in the ship. They him the Government.

He asks where, we have learnt that by the Scottish law, the validity of a deed dates from its registration and not its execution. We give him the quotation.

"No purchase of an estate is secure until the deed (that is the instrument certifying that actual delivery has been given) is put on record, nor is any mortgage effectual until the deed is in the same manner recorded. These records are accessible at all times to all persons."

the owners of the vessel again addressed Capt. Rogers, informing him that they intended immediately to engage a Steamer, and to make Government pay for the demurrage both of the steamer and the vessel. At the same time they put themselves in communication with the local Government—but in a style so very different from that which they had adopted towards Capt. Rogers that it is difficult to suppose the letter to have come from the same parties, and to relate to the same transaction. In that letter there is not a whisper of making Government pay demurrage for the vessel, and still less for the steamer, and the owners express their willingness even to withdraw their protection from Mr. Miller, if Government wishes it. The Deputy Governor on their assurance regarding the character of Mr. Miller, the Chief Mate, agreed to allow the vessel to depart with him on board, and took off the embargo, directing a letter to be sent to the Protector of Coolies at the Mauritius, to request him to examine and report the state of the emigrants on the arrival of the vessel.

We have been thus particular in recapitulating the circumstances of this case, because of its bearing upon the question of emigration. This is the first instance in which an attempt has been made to compel the Emigration Agent to adopt the Ship owner's opinion instead of his own, on the propriety of allowing a vessel freighted with emigrants, to proceed to sea. It is the first instance in which an attempt has been made, we might almost say, to oblige the responsible Agent of Government, and to deter him from the performance of his duty by threatening him with a prosecution for damages. It is important to record its complete failure. It is very gratifying to notice the vigilance and firmness which has been displayed by the Emigration Agent on whom rests the responsibility of checking those abuses to which this system of emigration is so liable. His conduct on the present occasion entitles him to the confidence and applause of the community; and while he continues in office, we have every reason to believe that the exportation of coolies will not degenerate into a slave trade.

REGISTRATION.—We have received a letter signed Register, from Farnecore, from some individual who tells us that he has some experience in registering deeds. We would willingly publish the letter, though it is not over courteous, but for the wanton and offensive expression in which the writer indulges towards Mr. George Thompson. We have invariably adopted the rule of not allowing any correspondent to apply any epithet to a brother editor or any other individual, through the medium of our columns, and which we would not venture to use on our own responsibility, and we are not disposed to depart from it now. Neither do we see the need of our correspondent's attack on Mr. Thompson, in reply to an article with which that gentleman had nothing to do, and which had nothing to do with him. We therefore withhold the letter, and offer a very brief reply to the Deputy Governor. The same day Messrs. Rustomjee and Co. replied to the Emigration Agent, asking him that they would not discharge the Chief Officer, but considered it a protection due to him to continue him in the ship. They him the Government.

He asks where, we have learnt that by the Scottish law, the validity of a deed dates from its registration and not its execution. We give him the quotation.

He seems to object to our proposal that Registration be made compulsory. We certainly did not intend by the use of this word to suggest that every man should be sent to jail or sentenced to work on the roads who neglected to register his deeds. We meant to inflict no other penalty for neglect than that the deed itself should be deemed incomplete or invalid until it had been registered. He says we have little idea how difficult it is to keep the Natives from driving a Hackery and pair through the most stringent enactment of Government. We see little difficulty however in blocking up the path even of a coach and four by making it as necessary to the validity of a deed that it should be registered, as that it should be signed by the parties.

Register says, that it is not necessary for a native in this country having a deed to register it, to take the trouble of going an hour's journey from his village. If he means that the man may send an agent to do the work for him, our argument for an improvement of the system soon to give greater facilities for registration than now exist, remains untouched. If, however, he means that the man must only at Civil stations, and as every village is not a Civil station, either the man who executes the deed or his substitute must travel, till he reaches one. Our correspondent doubts the correctness of our statement that the native is often obliged to dance a long attendance on a venal Native officer, and at length to give him some speed money to obtain the registration of his deeds. Far be it from us to affirm that such is the case at Farmedpore; though not for the reason assigned by Register, namely, that if it did occur, he must soon be made acquainted with it. There are more wicked things done in his Cutchery than he has ever dreamt of. We give him full credit for believing in the purity of his officers, and the regularity of his office, and we are happy to hear of such bright exceptions. Still we will venture to affirm that in many instances the Native who wants his deed registered speedily must be generous, and that nothing expedites registration so effectively as a little greasing of the Amlah's palm. The duty of Registration has never yet been placed in that position in our institutions, which its importance as the means of giving security to property, and of averting litigation, demands. The office is too often bestowed as an agreeable addition to allowances that are not large. The task of supervision is too often performed with laxity; the power of the office devolves on the Amlah, and the Amlah turns that power into money, as his ancestors have done since the golden age.—But when we have a little leisure from pressing engagements, we will take up the subject more fully.

—TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF THE BENGAL AUXILIARY MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—We have recently been favoured with a copy of this Report of the operations of the London Missionary Society under the Bengal Presidency. The number of its stations occupied by its missionaries, exclusive of Calcutta and its suburbs, is four; two in Bengal, Chinsurah and Berhampore; and two in the Western Provinces, Benares and Mirzapur. In the circle around Calcutta the number of missionaries is six, one of whom, the Rev. Mr. Lacroix, is absent in Europe. The Rev. Mr. Dixon has continued his labours at Union Chapel, and writes as follows: "The Church has been much as in former years—the congregation somewhat improved. Some interesting conversions have been effected, but it does not become me to mention them in detail; the day of the revelation of all things will show of what manner they are." It is highly gratifying to find that the entire expense of Union Chapel, including the Minister's salary, is defrayed by local subscription, and does not constitute any demand on the funds of the Parent Society.—The churches to the south of Calcutta, which are under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. DeRolt, have suffered greatly from the calamities of the season, and the ravages of cholera during the past year. This fatal malady has carried off not fewer than one in fifteen. Fifteen members have been added to the Church, and twelve more are expected to join it before the end of the year, but adds Mr. DeRolt, "though the belief in the truth of the Christian is universal in these parts, not one heathen has come forward during the year as a candidate for baptism."—The station at Kishinore is said not to be "in such a religious condition as could be desired." This has been owing to fluctuations in its superintendence, which have not ceased by the appointment of Mr. Paterson to the pastoral charge of it.—At the station of Bhuaneswar, Mr. Campbell has continued his useful and indefatigable labours in the Christian Institution, assisted in particular departments by some of his brethren. This Seminary is designed for the instruction of Heathen youth upon Christian principles, and follows in a great measure the plan pursued at the General Assembly's Institution. The number of pupils is about three hundred. The nature of their studies may be judged of from the syllabus of the first Class comprised in the Report, and which for Christianity, Church and General History, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, Plane Geometry, Algebra, Poetry and Composition. The success which has attended this and other attempts to combine a knowledge of Christian truth with general instruction, shows that the Natives are by no means adverse to the study of Divine Revelation, when offered to them through private and unofficial channels. Such seminaries will be found of the highest service to the good cause; for though the immediate results may not be great, they are silently and stealthily undermining the fabric of Hindoo superstition, and preparing the country for a more general reception of Christianity.—In the Female Department of the Institution Mrs. Campbell has under instruction twenty-two girls, of whom five are orphans, and seventeen the children of Native Christians. "The great object in view," says the Report, "is moral and religious instruction, and the inculcation of such principles will qualify the girls to become intelligent and respectable wives and mothers, and suited to the circumstances in which they are placed."—The station of Chinsurah has been deprived during the past year by death of the invaluable services of Mrs. Mundy, who was indeed a true 'mother in Israel.' All that has been recorded in commendation of her humble, patient, and persevering efforts, falls far short of what we fear it will be long before another individual is found qualified by that rare combination of benevolence and energy which she exhibited, to fill the void which her removal has created. At Berhampore, the duties of the station have been conducted during Mr. Hill's absence by Mr. Paterson and Mr. Lomel; their efforts have not been without success. Eight adults with their families were publicly baptized in the Mission Chapel on the 16th of June last. The Native Church now numbers seventeen, a small number, however, when considered as the result of more than seventeen years' labour; but encouraging when viewed as the first fruits of a more abundant harvest. The report from Benares is not encouraging. There are three missionaries, and three catechists at the station. The whole number of Native communicants does not exceed eleven, the fruit of more than eleven years' labour. The Missionaries say, "Fifteen months of our short Missionary career have passed over us and not one convert from among the heathen." In these disheartening circumstances it requires the strongest Christian faith, and the firmest confidence in the promises of Scripture to prevent the mind from sinking into a state of hopeless despondency. Would not the Missionaries in this city, the head quarters of Hindoo superstition, act wisely in transferring their ministrations, for a season at least, to the country, and gain the seat of their labors at some distance from the city so wholly given to idolatry. The number of Missionaries in Bengal shows that the mind of the simple villager is more open to the truths of the Gospel, than that of the proud and licentious inhabitant of the town; and certainly if there be one place in India, more amenable to the truths of the Gospel, it must be the city of Benares. The subscriptions raised in the country in connection with the Mission at its different stations, amount to about 50,000 Rupees, leaving on the Society in London no other charge than the salaries of the Missionaries, which we may assume at 45,000 Rupees. Two-fifths of the entire expenditure of the Mission appear due to the number of Missionaries from Europe employed in the various departments of labour, the number of native preachers engaged in the work, does not exceed thirteen. It is altogether disproportionate. It is to the arrangements of the Society appear to be essentially defective. The increase of European Missionaries is barred by the pecuniary circumstances of the Parent Society; but those who are already in the field might be rendered doubly useful, if they were adequately supplied with native assistants. Every European Missionary ought, at the very least, to have four Native teachers employed under his superintendence of the circle which he occupies. Their business should be to visit in rotation every village within their reach, once in the year, and offer if possible, and to sow in them the immortal seed of the word. His duty should consist in superintending and encouraging their labours, and following up their exertions as opportunity offered, and in imparting instruction to those who might be drawn through their labours to examine the truths of the Gospel. To the creation of an indigenous ministry, the most earnest attention of this Missionary body ought to be given. In order that the costly agency of European labour may be rendered more decidedly efficient, it is pleasing to find that the studies of the young catechists whom it is training up, "in a regular course of Bengalee reading intended, while they acquaint themselves thoroughly with the grammar and genius of the language, to lead them to a knowledge of the doctrines of the Hindoo School and system generally, and to furnish them with the arguments by which they may be successfully overruled." Mr. Doan and Mr. DeRode have also assisted Mr. Campbell in this paramount duty of training up Native ministers; but also the whole number of students, upon whom four Missions are thus to be bestowed they ought to be forty. It is as clear as a mathematical axiom that fourteen Missionaries from Europe, each working with four Native catechists under his direction, will produce a far more powerful impression on the country, than forty European Missionaries, working with only a solitary Native assistant a piece.

Tax Comtee.—On Monday evening, when the sun had sufficiently retired to leave the other members of the stock liberty to show themselves, we were surprised by the most magnificent sight we have ever had the fortune to witness. We think our remembrance of the great Comet of 1811 is distinct enough to admit of our saying, that its splendour was not to be compared with that of our present visitor. To such a length was its light drawn out on Monday evening, that it seemed impossible to believe it was a comet. It appeared more like a long streak of singularly luminous cloud—or a ray of the Aurora Borealis, somehow wandering from its proper region. A Comet however it was; and we had the good fortune to catch its nucleus in the telescope. On Tuesday evening, the nucleus was discernible by the naked eye; although both the proximity of the sun, and the growing light of the moon were great hindrances to our observations, and their effect was aggravated by the clouds. At present we can only call attention to the subject—although one might suppose that unnecessary. The time for seeing the comet will, we imagine, be very short, at least in the evening; and the sight of it will be something to be remembered.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2.

—The Theatre was knocked down, it is said, to Mr. Hurrell, who originally started in raising it, for 40,000 Rs. The Ster says, it was rumoured that the Missionaries had got as much as 45,000 Rs. for it. We doubt not much a rumour was spread to enhance its value at the auction sale. We have heard that it has been purchased in fact by Baboo Mootee Jall Baul, who intends to make it over to the new College or School he has established in its vicinity, to St. Xavier's College, of which this Seminary is to be a kind of branch, as it is said to have decided his mind on the subject.

—The new arrangements in the Supreme Court, consequent on the death of Mr. Vanjani, will effect a saving to Government of 1000 Rs. a year. Mr. J. B. Ryan is to be the Taxing Officer, and Chief Clerk of the Insolvent Court, and Mr. R. O'Dowd, the Receiver.

Mr. Ballin, of the Theatre, has just been carried off in a very few hours by Cholera. It was only a day or two ago that he was walking on the Strand at Serampore apparently in perfect health. The next notice we have of him announces his death.

—The Second Sessions of the Supreme Court was opened yesterday by an address from Sir Lawrence Peel. The Calendar is light. It contains not more than fourteen or fifteen cases. Though the multiplication of the Sessions will make a more frequent demand on the time of the Judges, they will be engaged at the Court for a shorter period on each occasion. The question is as long as it is broad, as it regards their convenience; but the benefits to the account of a shorter continuance is most decided.

FRIDAY, MARCH 3.

—The capital prize of 100,000 in the last Calcutta lottery has been won by a Banian residing at Bombay. Considering how the current of prizes in these lotteries has lately set in towards the sister Presidency, we are almost afraid that in counselling the abolition of lotteries, which has just been effected, we may be suspected of envy.

—The coronation of the new Sovereign of Greece has been postponed by the advice of the Astronomers and Pundits to Wednesday the 22d. The Chiefs have been directed to assemble at the Palace on the night of the 21st, to witness the rites and ceremonies on the occasion. The lad will be proclaimed and placed on the gubdee exactly at 33 minutes past 2, which is the auspicious moment, when the "heavenly intelligence" are most propitious. The presents made by the British representative on this occasion, it is said, will exceed three lakhs of Rupees.

—The local Government has called on the Magistrates to furnish a report on the operation of Act 21 of 1910, accompanied by any suggestions relative to the improvement of Municipal management. A large number of European and Native householders attended the last meeting of the Magistrates. They had been specially invited that they might have an opportunity of expressing their views on the working of the Act. The Chief Magistrate put the following suggestions for their consideration:

1st.—What had they—the Ratepayers, &c. effected in furtherance of that object? 2ndly. Had they any proposition to suggest to Government in respect of improvement to the present order of things? 3rdly. As the Town was divided into several municipal divisions whether they had any object in view to make the Assessment, Collection, &c. or in other words, the entire management of the Rates of their respective divisions, and lastly, if willing, what terms would they propose in assuming the Trust, or to adopt the precise terms of the Act, viz. "provided that all such majority of Ratepayers, shall present a scheme, which shall include his (the Governor of Fort Williams) sanction for the sale, and efficient execution of the Trust, the transfer of which from the present authority is sought of."—Baloo Bhattacharya, Member of the Council, after a short consultation with the great men present, asked for further time to consider the subject, which was granted.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4.

—We have omitted to mention that Government has recently established a Mail Carriage, which affords suitable accommodation for two passengers with light baggage between Calcutta and Durdum. The charge is the same as that for travelling by dawk, or eight annas a mile; but the rate of speed is more than double. The dawk seldom attains four miles an hour; the Mail coach moves at the rate of eight miles. We have not as yet seen any remarks by any individual who has travelled himself, if it is of the same consequence.

—The Ster of this morning has an allusion to the present pressure on the money market; which means a difficulty in obtaining money by those who need it—and also an article on the subject, which we would transfer to our column had we room. The Bengal Bank has been so besieged for loans, as to be obliged to raise the rate of interest to seven per cent.

—The Dock's Trace of the 25th instant, gives news from Seikha to the February. Major Outram was at Hyderabad, endeavouring to persuade the Amirs to comply with the Governor General's demand. They will on no account condescend to surrender the strip of ground along the banks of the Indus, which we demand of them. It would interfere with their hunting grounds. Without it, the navigation of the Indus cannot be considered as either open or safe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 5.

—The Transient steamer left Calcutta with a full complement of passengers. The Hon. Mr. Prinsep, Member of Council, embarked on her, and we have been informed that he left Calcutta under the usual salute. If so, this is the second instance in which salutes have recently been fired on a Sunday. On the occasion of Sir Hugh Gordon's visit to Barrackpore, a salute was fired on Sunday evening, and long after sunset. We have always understood it to be the rule, that no salutes were to be fired except on "lawful days," and between sunrise and sunset—provisions to Mr. Prinsep's departure, he received a salute from the Native in English, Sanskrit, and Persian. His reply, like every thing he which proceeds from his lips, is characterized by correct good sense, and clothed in chaste and appropriate language.

—We learn from the Star, that the Normandy horses which were recently imported from France, the first export of the kind—sold on an average of 900 Rs. each. Twenty-seven were brought to the hammer, and realized 21,000 Rupees.

—The anniversary meeting of the Mechanics' Institute is to be held to-morrow evening at the Town Hall, when Mr. George Thompson is expected to address the meeting. He will doubtless attract a very large audience. The attendance at the lectures delivered at this Institution has lately been very disheartening; scarcely fifty could be collected to listen to them.

—A Report of the Meeting of the Trustees of Ferguson, Brothers and Co. is given in this morning's Ster. About twenty-nine lakhs of Rupees have been collected and appropriated to the redemption of public property. Only four concerns have been left behind, but they have realized 25,000 Rs. more than the sums at which they were borne on the books. The out-turn of the Indigo concerns has been less than was anticipated. Mr. Jenkins, formerly one of the partners of the same, addressed the meeting and stated that the representation made at the Assam meeting respecting the claims of Briggs, Thurnham and Co. on the houses was "careless." It was not confined, as had been asserted, to 55,000; but amounted to no less a sum than 50,000. He expressed his satisfaction at the mode which had been adopted to deal with the concern, and stated that a dividend of from four to five annas in the Rupee would eventually be forthcoming to the owner or creditor.

—The circumstances connected with the detection of the Frank Cr. cr. which has been charged to cause the loss to the Bank, are given in the Friend of this morning. For the particulars we refer the reader to an editorial article.

TUESDAY, MARCH 7.

—The last dispatch from Seikha contained in the Dock's Time reviewed this morning, is anything but pacific. Letters had been received from Keachcha of the 10th February, H. M. 41st which had arrived at that station the previous day, had been detained by orders from Major Outram, till orders could be received from Sir C. Napier, or till amicable relations had been re-established. H. M. 41st was to be dispatched to Karachi forthwith, and two steamers were to proceed thither without delay with from 100 to 1000 recruits. It appears not only that the Amirs of Seikha have been playing a double game to gain time, but that the will of the British is anything but friendly to the establishment of our influence in their vicinity. Meanwhile the hot weather has set in, and will be followed by the rain, and the rise of the Indus, and the country will become unmanageable, and military operations will be attended with difficulty and danger.

—The Dock had not left Lahore on the 16th of February. A great deal of negotiation has been going on between him and the Sikhs, who stand in no ill the dread of the course which the Affghans may be induced to pursue, when again united under his vigorous rule. He has inflicted a large body of troops of all arms, and is said to expect much opposition in the Khyber.

—The installation of the young Rajah at Gwalior, and of Mansa Sahi as his Prime Minister, has been accomplished without any disturbance, and apparently to the satisfaction of the people. The British Resident was present and presented His Higginson with a splendid Khelat on the part of the Governor General. All idea of any interference on our part, either in the internal management of the country, or with the view of obtaining a slice of its territory, has died away.

At the last half yearly meeting of the Agra Bank, the Report of the Directors of this very prosperous institution was read. The Capital of the bank has been increased to 40 lakhs of Rupees; but the insolvency of Messrs. Briggs, Thurland and Co. has involved the Bank in the first serious loss it has ever sustained, and 20,017 Rs. have been appropriated to meet the loss. Still it has been enabled to declare a dividend at the rate of Twelve per cent. pro annum. The Branch Bank established at Madras, gives employment to Eight lakhs of Rupees worth of Capital.

Three soldiers of H. M. 10th were tried on Friday last as the Seasons for highway robbery on the plain lying between the Fort and the City. One was acquitted; two were found guilty and sentenced to one year's imprisonment with hard labor. One of these, Baldwin, very impudently told the Judge he would rather have been subjected to seven years transportation. He and his fellow culprit behaved in the most outrageous manner on their being removed to the Jail.

The Harbours states, that an audacious theft was committed in the Supreme Court yesterday. During a trial for burglary, one of the jurymen's umbrellas was burglariously taken away.

From the same journal we gather the amount of Import and Export Tonnage in 1862. To decide it we add the tonnages of previous years.

WISDOMARD, MARCH 8.

The Delhi Gazette informs that Lord Mahomed had taken his departure from Lahore by the 7th of February with all the members of his family. It appears that Capt. Nicholson will accompany him. Rana Singh Dhy, we are informed was directed to go to Dost Mahomed's encampment, and enquire whether any letter had been received from Mahomed Akbar Khan. He returned, saying that none had been received.

The statement given by us in a previous column, relative to the purchase of the Theatre by Baboo Mottee Lal Seal, appears to be incorrect. The Expenses of this morning states, that Mr. Marshall has rec'd it for sixty thousand Rupees to Capt. Baxter, whose wife was well known to the Calcutta public as Madame delaghy.

The Chamber of Commerce, at the meeting held yesterday, took into consideration the den which Indian planters have upon the crop for which they have made advances. A Committee was appointed to draft a law to be submitted to Government upon this subject. The same subject, it is said, is under the consideration of the Union Bank.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE HONORABLE THE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL OF INDIA IN COUNCIL.

Fort William, 28th February, 1862.
No. 40 of 1862.—His Majesty's 25th and 40th Regiments of Infantry to return to England, the President of the Council of India in Council cannot permit them to leave the shores of India without some public acknowledgment of their gallant services.

Both these Corps had served many years in India, and were remarkable for exemplary conduct before their embarkation for China. During the protracted struggle in a country new to Europeans, where the Troops were alternately exposed to great temptation and to harassing privations, those who distinguished their high character in all situations from Canton to Nanjing, in quarters and in the field, and they have now returned triumphant, having won the warm approval of His Excellency Sir Hugh Gough, Bart. and G. C. B., by whom they were commended.

The President of the Council of India in Council deeply sympathized in the suffering and losses of those Corps from the effect of sickness arising from exposure and vicissitudes of climate upon the distant service on which they were employed, and that they should thus imperially return to England they are recalled to the United Kingdom, He begs thus publicly to assure the Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and Soldiers of both these distinguished Regiments, that they carry with them the marked approbation of the Supreme Government.

The President of the Council of India in Council will need a gratifying day if he is enabled to notice the report of the General in Command upon the conduct of the Officers of the General Staff of the Army in China.

To the heads of Departments struck off by General Orders of the 13th instant, Lieutenant Colonel Mountain, C. B., Deputy Adjutant General, and Lieutenant Colonel, C. B., Deputy Quartermaster General, and Lieutenant Colonel, C. B., Deputy Quarter Master General, The President of the Council of India in Council considers it due publicly to acknowledge their valuable and unceasing exertions.

In thus taking leave of a body of Men, who, in conjunction with the rest of the Forces serving in China, have rendered so great services to this country, The President of the Council of India in Council has the satisfaction of assuring them, that these services have been most highly appreciated not only by the Government of India, but by their Sovereign, who has been pleased to direct, that Medals be granted to the Officers and Men of Her Majesty's and the East India Company's Naval and Military Forces without distinction, who took part in the more prominent events of the War, in commemoration of the success of Her Majesty's Arms in China, and in token of Her Majesty's high appreciation.

PRESIDENT OF THE ADDRESS TO THE HON. H. T. PRINCE, C.-G.

A deputation of Native gentlemen waited on the Honorable Mr. Prince on Friday, when the following Address in English was read by Baboo Bhakaram Nath.

To the Honorable Henry Thoby Prince, Esq.

SIR,—On the occasion of your departure from this land, which has been the scene of your patriotic labors, for that which is the land of your birth, and we trust will prove a place of honor and honorable repose, we the undersigned, some of whom have enjoyed your friendship from the earliest period of your career in this country, and all of whom have marked with satisfaction your public conduct, desire to convey to you some expression of our feelings of personal regard and public gratitude.

These among us who have been on terms of private intimacy with you, have admired the kindness of your disposition, the amity of your relations, and the steadiness of your attachments. The recollection of these features in your character, will increase the regret we shall experience, when we are deprived of your society.—You have to us, however, will be your restoration to the friends, who wait you in the land of your earliest and strongest affections.

That we sincerely wish, not merely as a friend, whose private and personal virtues we admire, but, as a public functionary, retiring from a service, in which you have been called to fill various situations of great responsibility, extensive powers, and high distinction. We believe that in all these situations, you have been guided by a love of justice, and a desire to advance by a love of the honor of the British name, and the happiness of the people of India. Without referring to the share, which forms a large part of your services, we may well suppose you to have had, in the framing of many wise and salutary enactments, during a period of your connection with the Supreme Government, to gain the sanction of the Emperor of a Regulation (Regulation VII. of 1851), which secured the most valuable benefits, both to the Zemindars and the Leaseholders of the provinces. You have also on various occasions manifested your desire, to maintain (sacrosanct) the rights of the landed Proprietors, and the enjoyment of their religious privileges of all classes of the Native Community.

Yourself possessed of rare talents, and distinguished by high attainments in the Literature of India, you have been the fosterer and promoter of Oriental Learning, and the warm defender of the learning, which attempts have been made, either to supplant or to retard it. When you shall be no longer among us, we shall be missing the works which you have published, of your ability to elucidate some of the most interesting portions of our Native Literature.

We have thus endeavored to enumerate a few of the special claims which you have upon our gratitude and esteem.

In parting with you, we venture to hope that while we shall follow you to your own country, with our best wishes for your personal and domestic happiness, you will not, when far away from those whom you have beloved, nor cease to feel a lively and generous interest in our future welfare. Your comprehensive knowledge, your ripe experience, and your unquenchable thirst for public business, secularly or religiously, is a leading part in the grave deliberations which affect the destinies of this great empire, and we therefore trust, that we shall yet do duty to you from the counsel you may be qualified to give, and the co-operation you may be able to afford, in those great measures which concern the future Government of India.

To the expression of our sincere desire for your own safe arrival in England, we would unite our expressions of a wish equally fervent, that with your estimable and your youthful family may also participate in the good fortunes and that you may together long live, to enjoy in abundance the richest blessings that our crown is able to bestow to the public service.

In conclusion, we have the honor to request that you will do us the favor of sitting for your bust, to be hereafter preserved as a memorial of your residence among us.

We have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient Servants.

(Here follow a number of Signatures by Hindoo, Mahomedans and Parsees.)

In presenting the Address, the Baboo very feelingly expressed the regret that was felt by himself and his constituents in parting with one who had known for so many years—one who was held in the highest esteem by Government, that he had held, with so much credit to himself and satisfaction to those under him. He had been directed by his friends to request that Mr. Prince would kindly favor them by sitting for a Bust, when he arrived in England, and they most anxiously wished to have some lasting memorial of one who had so long and so faithfully served them.

An Address in Sanscrit, composed by Kashi Nath, Pandit of the Sanskrit College, was read by a young Native.

Moulvi Iftakher Ahmed Kaboor, of the Madras, read an Address in Persian.

To all of which Mr. Prince made the following reply in a most eloquent and feeling manner.

GENTLEMEN,—It is indeed with great satisfaction and pride, that I receive from you this ungrudging testimonial of the high regard in which the Community you so worthily represent. The varied phrases and languages in which your sentiments have been conveyed, gives them in my eyes additional value.

All united in the same feeling towards myself, all yielding to the same pure and honest desire to bear testimony to conduct and qualities you approve. To that pure feeling, I ascribe the honors you have paid me; for as I have not been a large dispenser of patronage, nor have filled situations which gave the power of placing persons under my control, and even the most sceptical might seek in vain for any source from which they could have flowed, there is not as honorable to those who have joined in them as flattering to me, as the unworthy object of your praise.

I therefore leave the Editor of the Friend to be content with his subscribers and his conscience (if he possesses one) for his correct and well advised article under comment.

Yours faithfully,

Diogenes, Feb. 2nd, 1863.

RELIGIOUS.

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—The late "Conventicle" or Non-Interunion Ministers have forwarded a memorial for the consideration of Robert Peel and the other members of the Government. The document is of considerable length, but the following is the most important portion of it:—

"The memorialists desire again to express their anxiety that their present appeal, and the measures they have felt themselves obliged to adopt, may not be misunderstood. The deliberate conviction to which they have come—that, if they cannot have liberty to maintain and act upon the principles which they have avowed, in the position of a church established by the state, they must relinquish that position, is not the result of disappointment or irritation, or any want of regard to the important benefits which the present establishment of the church confers upon the people of Scotland. On the contrary, such is their sense of the value of that establishment, such are their apprehensions of the many evils likely to result from its disruption or overthrow, and such also, their anxiety to remain in the discharge of their spiritual duties in the preaching of the Gospel, and the oversight of their parishes, under the shade of that national protection and favour, which was the happy fruit of their system, the labourers, and the sufferings of their fathers, that they have been willing to make the utmost possible concessions with a view to the restoration of harmony, and, were not the principles at issue, they would not consent, so sacrifice of feeling or even of consistency to which they would not submit, if by any means they might secure a respite, the very idea of which they have all along been most reluctant to entertain.

"But they feel that the time is come when the final determination of this question can be postponed no longer, and as they cannot disguise from themselves, so neither would they deem it right to conceal from the Government and the country, the results of a continued refusal on the part of the Legislature of that indispensable measure of relief which they think they have a good right to ask and good reason to expect. Their situation, they are fully and deeply aware, is embarrassing. They cannot conduct the affairs of the church in the manner by which the civil courts have prescribed; they could not themselves remain in the communion of a church which they were to ignore its procedure according to the principles now held to be involved in the civil law; nor can they allow others, in the same communion, to do so. But it is well known that a large minority of the church's officers and members are prepared, in obedience to the civil power, to cast off her authority; and were the church, while continuing to claim the advantages secured to her by law, to preserve, as she must in principle do, in maintaining her discipline over all who, under whatever civil sanction or compulsion, transgress her orders and violate her laws, founded, as she believes, in the word of God,—not only would she be exposed to serious obloquy and reproach, but a spectacle both painful and scandalous must, in all probability, be exhibited, of two sections of the same church serving with one another, in the use of civil penalties on the one hand, and spiritual excommunications on the other. Hitherto, notwithstanding the opposition which they have encountered, the church has never felt herself compelled to inflict the severities of her discipline on any of her ministers or members for an act done under the compulsion of the civil courts, or in obedience to what has been declared to be the civil law. She has proceeded against none, excepting the few individuals who of their own accord, and without any plea of necessity, have placed themselves in a position of disobedience to her authority. Even this, however, has led to unnecessary consequences; and after the final decision of the supreme civil court, affirming the civil law, and the consequent flow of her officers-bearers have intimated their determination to act, it is plain that if no legislative relief be conceded, and if the Church proceed according to her own views of duty, she will be obliged to transgress her rules, she has no alternative but to deal forth the resources of ecclesiastical power in a manner that must provoke resistance, and must necessarily result in an irreconcilable schism and disaster. The memorialists are not ashamed to confess, that they shrink from such an exhibition as would then be presented before the people of Scotland; and that they are most anxious to avoid, among others, which has weighed much in determining them to bring this whole question to a final and to return from their present position, as connected with the establishment, an amicable arrangement on mutually consistent with the civil courts, which duty, and with their brethren, who set at naught, their jurisdiction—a contest which could not fail to be attended with most disastrous consequences, affecting both the majority of law, and the higher interests of religion.

"But the memorialists have stated other grounds on which chiefly they rest their determination, as maintained by Christian duty and sound principle. It has been with them a pain to see that they have felt themselves compelled to oppose the civil courts in any of the decisions which they have pronounced. They have done so, only because their consciences required it, and because the constitution of the church, which they have established by law, sanctioned and authorized the measures which they adopted. They are still most decidedly of the same opinion. But, as they claim for the Church no right of resistance to the civil magistracy in the exercise of his authority, as determining the terms on which he will establish the Church, so they feel, that if the Government and Legislature of the country do not interfere for their relief from the condition to which they are now reduced by the Supreme Civil Court—viz., the condition of subjection in all things spiritual to civil control—it is not for them, as servants of that Lord whose kingdom is not of this world, to violate the constitution further; they can only protest, with solemnity, against the wrong which they believe the Church has sustained, and leave with the rulers of the nation itself, the responsibility of allowing national institutions of the Established Church of Scotland to be subverted and overthrown.

"In conclusion, the memorialists have leave very respectfully to remind her Majesty's Government of the obligation under which states and their rulers lie to the filiation by whom kings reign and princes are justly,—whom cause they are bound to oppose, and whose Church it is alike their interest and their duty to support and secure in all the freedom with which He has endowed them. The memorialists deeply feel the solemnity of the question now submitted to the decision of Parliament and of the nation; it being, in the opinion of the memorialists, nothing less than the question, whether the Church, which has been established in Scotland is to be preserved inviolate, according to the terms of treaties, or whether this great kingdom is to remain, as the memorialists would regard it, the laicized national office, of not only breaking the national faith, but of disavowing the authority of Christ in his own house, and refusing to recognize his Church as a free spiritual society, instituted by him, and governed by his laws alone.

"The memorialists now leave the whole subject in the hands of her Majesty's Government, trusting to the solemn prayer to Almighty God, that He may direct the councils of her Majesty to the conclusion which shall most conduce to the good of the country, and to His own glory.

"Signed in the name and by the authority of the assembled ministers."

"Chairman of the Meeting."

ROBERT HALDANE, Esq.—This venerable gentleman died at Edinburgh on December 26th, the 79th year of his age. Mr. Haldane devoted his whole energies from an early period to the cause of true religion, and with an efficacy rarely in any age equalled. At a period when Moderation in the Church of Scotland was to be maintained, or rather at its end, he arose, and imagined the gigantic enterprise of evangelizing India; with a view to which it was that his estate at Arbuthnot was sold. But after some progress was made, the measure was arrested by public and official interdiction from the Board of Council, rested on the dread of an unhappiness of our Indian dominions, by an interference with superintendence of Mr. Haldane turned his attention to the revival of religion in Scotland itself, when prevented from dealing with a dead colony. We have come to know that, as early as 1810, he had spent $50,000, in the cause of the gospel; what we know not, but he never ceased from his labours.—Ibid.

THE MORNING.—As a number of our townsmen are taken in the course of this delirious rage, quote for their edification, the following extracts from one of the American papers received this week. "These people are still busy, but the prophet, Jos Smith, in his own unhappiness, is not so busy, and is unable to parade. In consequence of the increase of his holy business, Jos has resigned the editorship of the Times and Seasons into the hands of Brother Tyler, who is said to be a wiser and more experienced editor. The temple is rapidly going up—a cargo of lumber having arrived from the Upper Mississippi to further the work."—Birmingham Advertiser.

MICHAEL'S WEEK.

OPENING OF 1863.—But we had intended to say, that we are connecting a new chapter of our history under inspiring circumstances, not in reference merely to our Journal, but with regard to the support, or withdrawal of our public relations with the United States in the spirit. Ourselves a glance over the events of the last twelve months, we are struck with evident signs of a material advance. Lord John Russell once said, very rarely, that we cannot afford to have a Revolution every year. The truth is, however, that every year brings with it a revolution, and all this is done by revolution. We are not sure but that the Tariff is as great a revolution, and as violent a one, as the Jackson bill; and in all this, the Conservative is strenuously to carry the latter through the House of Obstructors; while, in the financial Reform, the discontented aristocracy were curbed and made to succumb by the energy of all classes in the support of a cotton-spinner. The House of Lords were more reduced to that dignified inaccessibility which best comports with the wily of our institutions and the public will, contained itself during the session, with registering the measures that had been dictated to the Commons by the Conservative Premier; measures submitted to as necessary, but every one of which has proved a rod of celestial punishment to the party who placed the reins of power in his hand.

The Slitting-Scal, that previous trick of Ingermin, devolving the former with a mockery of protection, and hitting out to the merchant a bounty upon gambling,—has succeeded as admirably as the genius of Napoleon I. in the matter of the corn, and produced a salutary Tariff, destructive of our trade; it has carried bankruptcy and ruin into the Corn trade to an unprecedented extent; and, with the loss of a good harvest, it is calculated to produce at the moment as injurious to the farmer, and least beneficial to the public. The Tariff, unsettling every just, and settling nothing, because arbitrary and partial, and leaving the main Articles of import and export, has been in a high blow and great discomfiture to the cattle-dealers and cattle-keepers, although they were made more tributary to the State, but it has knocked on the head the Idol of Protection in which they trusted. It is now felt to be inevitable that other changes must follow,—that the present Corn-law must be abandoned, and the farmer is invited to consider "whether the change," great though it be, were not better made at once. "Maintain all improvements as at a stand, and agricultural industry is paralysed. The Locomotive is the third great industrial benefit conferred upon the country by the Conservative majority of Ninety-one,—the third of the People's triad, the third-servant of Freedom,—admirably adapted to render taxation as equitable and as painless as possible, and thereby to teach every man to reflect what is done with the proceeds of taxation. It has never been known that the people may be rendered wiser by the imposition.

Upon the whole, it cannot be doubted, that the Corn-law question, or rather, the broader question of Free-trade and the Rights of Labour,—has rapidly advanced during the session, and much has also been done in dispelling a host of popular illusions, which, during the reign of the Whigs, it was the instrument of turning old principles to a new sense in the science of illumination. The Whigs have dimly by the side of the new Tory lights. Upon the subject of National Education, Lord Shaftesbury is as great a Liberal, as though a utilitarian, as the noble Ex-president of the Council. The Irish Bishops protest against the Popish Education Board in vain. The Ke Foxbury agitation is quenched. It is quite refreshing to be relieved from the endless Irish question, and to find it admitted by Conservative journals, that the landlords and the agrarian system are the cause of the crime and suffering in Ireland, and that the Government of O'Connell. The Canada question was already settled. Sir Charles Inge's law has not only justice: Lord Shaftesbury's policy; he has given the coup de grace to the Tory oligarchy in that colony. In the West India Colonies, the Planters are anticipating their discussions the inevitable reduction of the sugar duties, feeling that the days of their domination are numbered. Now all these are cheering indications, that, strong as the Government is in its parliamentary majority, there is something stronger still in the spirit of the times, or rather in the force of the moral law, which is compelling them to do so.

We look forward to the coming Session with more hope than ever. Sir Robert Peel's policy, since his return to office, has been to do what he must be brought a disposition to resist, he has lost. He will be like a husbandman in the midst of his harvest without a whip, or the semblance of it, would be found in his country. The year 1863 certainly opens under auspices similar to the one that has just closed. The hours anticipations of war has everywhere been silenced, and the sword is returned to its scabbard. A Christian, re-converted and subdued, will no more tax his conscience, or threaten the security of our Indian Empire. Peace with China opens new prospects for commerce in the East. The East India Company, with its allies, and our public relations with the United States. Great Britain is once more at peace with all the world.

without having any reason to apprehend a rupture with any power, civilised or savage, in the world. Here is abundant cause for national gratitude and confidence. In this spirit, we with our readers emphatically say a happy new year.—Fat.

THE LATE LORD HILL.—Nothing could be more serene and peaceful than the death of Lord Hill, except the calm, dignified, tender of his life. He knew well for a considerable time that death was the inevitable termination of his term, and he prepared himself for that event with the resignation of a Christian, and the fortitude of a good man. He attended Divine service at the parish church regularly with his two sons—two of the most noble and noble in existence—and on one occasion he was forcibly struck with the text from which Dr. Cambier addressed his congregation, "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." On returning home, he spoke on the subject of the sermon with great earnestness, and dignified what he said, "Of what avail are all human honours when our commonship whips us on, that when weighed in the balance we shall be found wanting?" His sister related his attention to a sacrifice which was infinite in the Almighty's eye to blot out all guilt of thought or deed; and the dying soldier avowed that upon that rock all his hopes were placed; for if God were so pleased to accept that sacrifice, man was unable to appear before him. To add to the affliction of the household (now Lord Hill) and the shock of the members of the family, the death of Mrs. Hill, the mother of his Lordship, expired on Tuesday week at the Chelsea, after a severe illness. The death of the amiable lady, although long expected, was a great loss to the family at the last moment, that the arrangements which had been previously made for the procession of the funeral of his Lordship were altogether laid aside. The death was so sudden, that the family so great, that several of its members were unable to attend.—Bristol Journal.

SIR CHARLES BACON'S SUCCESSION.—The Times newspaper intimates that his Excellency's departure, on account of ill health, has been anticipated for some time past, and that Lord Bile, the secretary for Ireland, is likely to be Sir Charles's successor.—Fat.

FIRE IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Monday, Mr. Braidwood, the superintendent of the Brigade Force, at the meeting of the Directors forming the Committee of the London Fire Establishment, made his annual report of the fire conditions, and the damage caused during the past year (1893) in and around the Metropolis. The report commences by stating that there was an increase in London, the number of last year exceeding the number of the preceding twelve months, and 313 over the average of the last nine years, though happily not so extensive in magnitude. The following are the number of fires that have taken place since the 1st of January in the year 1893, together with the number of houses totally destroyed, and those seriously and slightly damaged:—In 1893, there were 440 fires, destroying 31 houses totally, and damaging 497 other buildings. In 1894, 408 fires; houses burned down, 26; and 454 injured. In 1895, 471 fires; 31 houses burned down, and 440 damaged seriously and slightly. In 1896, 564 fires; 24 houses totally destroyed, and 531 more were damaged. In 1897, 501 fires; 23 houses consumed, and 479 damaged. In 1898, 560 fires; 33 houses destroyed, and 585 injured. In 1899, 504 fires; 17 houses consumed, and 567 damaged. In 1900, 661 fires; 36 houses burned down, and 655 damaged. In 1901, 660 fires; 34 houses totally consumed, 473 injured; and last year (1902), 709 fires; 34 houses consumed, and 743 more or less injured. From the report, it appears that the chief number of the fire takes place in private and lodging houses, and carpenters' workshops. Public-houses and places of recreation, and the like, upwards of 30 persons have lost their lives at fires in the course of the year.—Fat.

"THE UNIVERSITY HALL OF COMMERCE."—On Monday, the opening of the building in Threadneedle-street, recently erected by Mr. Mackay, was celebrated by a dinner, under the auspices of the Lord Mayor, several of the aldermen, and aldermen. The interior of the establishment, which is at once spacious and elegant, consist of a hall of assembly, with every accommodation for the transaction of business connected with the general management of the City of London, a reading room supplied with British and foreign newspapers; private apartments, which participate in the hall may be retained to conduct negotiations of a confidential character; a number of small offices, with iron safes, a register office, &c. Lord J. Russell arrived soon after the commencement of the proceedings, and was received with loud cheers. The Lord Mayor proposed, "Propriety to the Hall of Commerce." That magnificent building had been erected by the united means of one man, Mr. Mackay, at a cost of more than 50,000*l.* The Lord Mayor next gave the health of "the Representatives of the City of London." Mr. Masterman having had occasion to retire, Lord J. Russell said, he derived some pleasure to return thanks. He was sure they were all occupied by him cordial feeling of admiration of the public spirit and the earnestness which had animated the work, and taken the building of that great and splendid hall, and that they wished him the fullest and most complete success. In conclusion, he would like to give, as a toast, "Prosperity to the City of London and the trade therein." Among the embellishments of this institution, a beautiful scene placed at the grand entrance, attracted general admiration. It is conceived in noble and expressive Whittier's style, the scene of life, seated on the mile-stone, and struck at the moment when the merry sound of bells falls strikes upon his ear.—Fat.

BLANKETTING OPERATIONS.—The operations which were issued on the part of the Government against Thomas Patterson, of Holloway-street, were returnable at 300-street on Saturday; but Patterson did not attend, and warrants were issued for his apprehension. Mr. Chamberlain, counsel for the prosecution, stated that it was not the intention of Government to extend any leniency towards Patterson, as they were determined to suppress anything which might be injurious to the religious feelings of society. He also intimated, that it might be a matter of future consideration whether the power of Magistrates in such cases should not be enlarged by law for all cases that could be done against persons guilty of the offences with which Patterson was charged was to find them in the penalty of 40*l.* for every separate offence against spiritualism. He stated that he had been turned out of his shop at his house, 40, Abchurch-lane, he was, a middle man; he was in arrears with his rent; and the first landlord took possession on Wednesday.—Fat.

NEW RAIN GAUGE.—Mr. Dickinson, an extensive popular living near Weyford, has made a paper-mill on the river Colne, reports to the following experiment to ascertain what quantity of water they may convert to supply his customers. On the hills in the neighbourhood of his mills he has fixed a gauge in the ground to little depth below the surface. By consulting this gauge, he is enabled to compute the amount of rain which falls by the day, and during the entire season, and which must be again re-estimated before it can be decreased by evaporation. Experience has proved to him that, with this index, he can predict the amount of the inflow of tributary water which the river Colne, whereby his mills are worked, will receive. This statement was made at the Institution of Civil Engineers, by Mr. Clouston, and substantiated by Mr. Dickinson, and has been well received by the audience.—Fat.

THE RE-BUILDING OF HAMBURG.—We have seen a map of the alterations proposed to be effected. They are evidently great improvements, and will render the new streets far more handsome and commodious than the old ones. In the neighbourhood of the New Exchange, which stands unimpaired in the midst of the ruins caused by the fire, the little forts, or casemates, which are too narrow to be available for the purposes of defence, will be filled up, and on the ground behind the Exchange will be erected the new Senate-house, the Treasury, and the Courts of law. To this spot, thus forming the great centre of the new town, a number of streets will lead, both wider and straighter than those formerly existing, and sites will be reserved for churches, market-places, and other public buildings. The use of houses on the pleasant promenade of the Jungfermanns, in front of the lake called the Binnen Alster, (which was entirely destroyed by the fire) will also be rebuilt in a more regular fashion; and the promenade itself will now embrace only three miles of the Binnen Alster, will be carried round the fourth or south-east side. Thus there will be formed a terrace, bordered and shaded by the trees, along the sides of the lake. This will be greatly to the beauty of the spot, as well as to the enjoyment of the Hamburgers. In addition to these improvements, the Corporation has decided on erecting a lock and other works for opening a navigable canal between the rivers Ritz and Alster. A complete system of sewers, also, upon the large scale of those in London, will be established; and one of the new lines is already in progress of execution. The greater part of the new plan is, we are given to understand, the work of Mr. William Lindley, an English engineer.—Times.

THE FARRINGTON STREET is about to be fully tried in Tobago. We were informed by a friend on whose authority we can rely, that one of our most extensive attorneys (in consequence of instructions from home) has recently obtained about 100 acres of waste land, and estates under his charge to be surveyed, and divided into small lots, which he means to offer to the labourers of the estate at a moderate rate of purchase. An entire long out of cultivation, and the land is now being cleared, and the first crops are being sown. The experiment farmers is about to be entered into, and once begun, it must, in self-defence even, be adopted by all.—Tobago Gazette.

THE UNIVERSITY OF DORSET has just been deprived of two of its professors by a summer sea voyage on board the Russian government. Dr. Uman, professor of theology, had filled the rectorial duties from 1890 to 1901, and had then rendered the resignation of that dignity on the plea of ill-health. His resignation was accordingly accepted, and he was invited to the purchase of a splendid villa estate presented to their late rector, as a token of their respect. According to the Russian law, no public officer is allowed to accept any such gift, and he has inferior, without the express permission of his superiors. Nevertheless, Professor Uman did accept the proffered present, and Dr. Dunga, professor of law, published in the Pravda the resignation of his position. The Russian government has marked its displeasure of this proceeding, by dismissing Professor Uman from the public service, and transferring him to a post in the Ministry of Education. Professor Dunga has been punished by being removed to an inferior appointment at the University of Kazan.—Fat.

THE VICTORY AT HYDRABAD.—Seldom has any event come upon the public so unexpectedly as the announcement of a great victory gained by Sir Charles Napier over the Amers of Scinde. The last notes of war had died away in India, and the sword was supposed to have been consigned for a long day to its sheath, when we learn that one of the most obstinate engagements in which our troops have ever been employed, was fought on the 17th of February last, and one of the most severely contested yet signal victories obtained on the banks of the Indus. For the particulars of this victory we refer to the copious extracts we have made from the Bombay Times in another column. Never perhaps since the days of Wellesley and Lake have our armies been engaged with so obstinate a foe. The enemy consisted of no coward rabble, but of disciplined troops, and exhibited a degree of determined courage, far exceeding that of the Afghans. The disproportion between the strength of the two armies in point of numbers, was extraordinary: 1700 British troops were opposed to 22,000 Beluchers. The ground was so judiciously chosen by the enemy as to give them every advantage of position. The obstinacy with which they fought may be judged of from their loss, a thousand killed and four thousand wounded. But under Providence, we have achieved a great victory. Napier has not merely upheld the honour of his name, so celebrated in the annals of the ages, but added fresh lustre to it. All the eccentricities of his career since he assumed the command of Scinde, are lost sight of in the admiration we feel at his judicious dispositions in the field, and his daring chivalrous courage. In one single battle the ruling dynasty is humbled to the dust, and the independence of Scinde annihilated. The country lies at the mercy of Lord Ellenborough, and it remains for his Lordship to determine whether the Talpans "have ceased to reign," and the country is to be annexed to the British dominions, or whether the nominal sovereignty of Hyderabad, and some scraps of territory around it, shall be continued for a few years longer to the vanquished Amers.

By what facility does it happen that the most pacific Governors General are thus drawn into warlike enterprises? By what irresistible combination of circumstances has it happened that Lord Amherst was led to a long and expensive conflict with Barmah; that Lord Auckland, though whom no man more cordially desired to avoid war, was plunged into a disastrous conflict in Afghanistan; and that Lord E. himself, who came out to restore peace in India and Asia, and who is anxious that his peaceful policy should form the pride of his administration, has been committed to hostilities with a state with which we were at peace, and in a single battle has become master of the kingdom of Scinde? Is it the condition of our tenure in India that we are thus to be engaged in uninterrupted hostilities; while there remains a prince capable of opposing our authority. Such indeed would appear to be our destiny here—if the expression may be used without impropriety. Whether it be in war dictated by self defence, or dictated by a spirit of aggression, it seems as though we were never to be at peace, till every spark of independent power has been extinguished.

The justice of the quarrel is severely arraigned by the Editor of the Bombay Times. He seems to think it far more unjustifiable than the attack on Afghanistan by Lord Auckland. In that case there was the apparent necessity of self defence to palliate, if not to excuse, the invasion of a country in which our great European rival had established an influence incompatible with our security. But here it is urged, the Amers had agreed to every demand but one. They had yielded up territories on the North and the South, at the demand of the Governor General. They objected only to the relinquishment of a strip of land on the banks of the Indus which would have destroyed their hunting grounds. This is scarcely a sufficient ground for annihilating their power. Then, they attacked Major Outram while he sustained the sacred character of an Envoy. But to this it may be said, that the attack arose from the irrepressible feelings of their troops; and that the Envoy was advised of his danger and entreated to retire. After the attack had been made on him indeed, there was no option left, but for Sir Charles Napier to come up to his rescue. When the General found a hostile enemy blocking up his path, he had no choice between attacking them, or being annihilated with his army. More detailed information is required before we can form an opinion of the justice of the quarrel.

But the main question which now remains for consideration is, what are we to do with Scinde? On the 1st of October last, when the second proclamation of Scinde was issued, this country was not within the limits "marked out to be assigned to our empire," with which Lord Ellenborough pledged himself to be content. But then it is a country without the possession of which our boundary of the Indus cannot be compact. Neither can the navigation of that river be considered safe while an independent, and now hostile, power keeps possession of either bank and of the Delta. It is productive, and under our management, may be made more productive, and the troops required to keep possession of it, will cost us nothing; the country itself will maintain these with ease. It lies within a week's march of our Western Capital. Its high roads do not run through impassable defiles like the Bikan and the Khyber and the Khoond Ghul; they consist of magnificent streams, which our steam flotilla may traverse with speed and safety. It lies open to the sea, and troops, ammunition and supplies may be poured in with ease. It is a plain and may be defended with little difficulty, for there will soon be no enemy more formidable than the last. The late government has been pronounced to be the most grinding despotism in Asia; and our rule would be a blessing. We should disforest the Sikhargah, repeal the sumat laws, restore the ruined cities, revive commerce, dispense justice, and diffuse happiness; and our title to it by the right of conquest would be as good as that of the Talpans, whose occupation is of yesterday, and who have no prescription to support them. What is to be done? Shall we keep the country, or shall we relinquish it? To relinquish it would be little short of folly; to retain, may be a crime.

After the foregoing remarks were in type, we received the Bombay Times of the 4th, which gives a different view of the origin of the quarrel with the Amers. Our contemporary appears to state that they had agreed to all the provisions of the treaty "symbolized and unjust as many of them were," by which we are, we suppose, to understand that they had not only given up the territory demanded of them on the north and the south, but had also agreed to the partial destruction of their hunting grounds, that the navigation of the Indus might be unimpeded. He states that after every question had been settled and the treaty signed, a heavy pecuniary mule was imposed on them for having corresponded with some foreign power contrary to the treaty of 1839. To what guilty correspondence our contemporary alludes, we have not informed us. That the Amers were in correspondence with those who endeavored to raise Central Asia against us in 1837 and 38, is matter of history; but Lord Ellenborough can scarcely intend to punish negotiations belonging to the days of Lord Auckland, which in the case of Dost Mahomed, and his party have proved to be no sufficient cause of war. And with what power the Amers ever have corresponded with the last four years since we marched into Afghanistan and broke up the combination, it is difficult to divine, except it be with Akbar Khan.

The article of our contemporary is singularly origination. He speaks of the Governor General as having interposed a "twink," he talks of "no small amount of dishonest and discreditable negotiations." He imputes the worst conduct and the worst motive to Lord Ellenborough. If he is in full possession of the terms of the negotiation, he should lay them before his readers. If not, he should suspend his own judgment. It may be that the present attack on the Amers is the most unjustifiable and the most nefarious measure which the British Government has yet undertaken; but we have no evidence whatever of the fact. We only say that our Envoy was attacked by overwhelming numbers, headed by a relative of the ruling family; and that General Napier was placed in a situation in which he must have fought and conquered, or have been annihilated. The Bombay Times is so sensitive on the subject of the Amers war, that if he can trace the slightest resemblance between any measure of the present government, and that of Lord Auckland, his indignation is kindled, and his judgment falls into abeyance. Such may have been the case in the present instance, for the demand on Scinde is compared to that made on the Dost, which was of course every thing that was villainous.—But we must wait for fuller information.

SPECIAL APPEALS.—The Act which has recently been passed relative to Special Appeals, involve an important principle of law and an essential change in the jurisdiction of the Courts; and appears therefore to require more than a cursory remark. We perceive that the Hurkars has offered some comments on it, written on the whole, in a spirit of moderation, which deserves to be noted.

Every suitor in a Court is entitled to one regular appeal as a matter of right. But when the decision involves a question of law, or of usage having the force of law, or some important point on which no judicial opinion has been given, he is allowed a second or special appeal. These special appeals have reference therefore to constructions of law of scarcely less importance than the laws themselves, and demand the highest legal knowledge and experience, such as cannot be supposed to reside except in the highest Court of Law. Hitherto however it has been the practice for the Zillah Judges to hear special appeals from the decisions passed by the Principal Sudder Ameen, in appeal from the decrees of Sudder Ameen and Mooniffs. It must be evident that the importance of the question involved in a second appeal does not depend upon the magnitude or otherwise of the particular interests at stake. A suit of the value of 300 Rupees may involve a point of law which requires the highest legal acumen and judgment which our judicial institutions can supply, and which ought not to be fixed except by the highest legal authority. The next application of that very construction of law may determine a suit of ten times its value. It is important to the interests of justice therefore that these legal points should be decided by the Court of final resort, and not by any intermediate tribunal.

It is important also that the constructions of law established by these special appeals should be uniform, which can never be the case, if every Zillah Judge is at liberty to establish them, and no appeal lies from his decision. We may thus come to have a different law in every district. Upon general principles therefore, the decision of these points of law should be vested in a Court, where they will be examined and settled by the first Judges of the land, and of which the decisions will be uniformly respected in every Court throughout the country. But the pending position of the Zillah Judges at the present time renders this arrangement almost imperative. It is an anomaly in our arrangements that the Civil Judges in the various districts have not as formerly the benefit of any legal training and experience. They are transferred at once from a Magistrate's or Collector's office to the office of Civil Judge, to preside over the administration of Civil law, of which they have no experience. That they must be unqualified for a considerable time after they have been raised to the bench, to decide knotty points of law, and to furnish a correct construction of the Acts, is a fault which originates not with them, but with the system; but while it continues to exist, there is the strongest reason for leaving the decision of special appeals to the Sudder Court.

It is true that the Sudder Court has been in the habit of furnishing constructions of law for the guidance of the subordinate Courts; but these extra-judicial decisions have not been without great and manifold inconvenience. The concurrence of the two chief Courts at Allahabad and Calcutta was made necessary to the validity of any such construction. Sometimes the Court of Allahabad consisted of four Judges; and occasionally the opinion of two of them neutralised that of the other two. Sometimes the upper Court decided against the lower Court. Indeed the disagreement has been often found to be very perplexing, and to occupy much of the time of the two tribunals. In such cases a reference is made to the Executive Government; but to this course there lies the most serious objection. The constructions thus given were moreover framed on A. B. cases, without a full statement of facts and arguments, without the attendance of the parties or their pleaders, or any friction of legal argument. Perhaps the construction thus delivered upon the imperfect consideration of a fictitious case, was found erroneous when the same point came in a judicial form before the Court. Many other inconveniences might be pointed out; but these are sufficient to justify the change by which the Sudder Courts have been re-arranged from giving judgments on points of law, except when the whole case is argued judicially before them. Though the new law provides only for special appeals, and for those constructions of law which are to be determined by such appeals, we have reason to suppose that the Court will still be at liberty to issue explanations of minor questions of law and practice. There are a variety of subordinate points on which it is highly important that the Sudder Court should give the benefit of its experience and judgment to the lower Courts.

Against the new law it may be urged, that the multiplication of special appeals from 500 to 1000, which will probably be the case, will consume much of the time of the Sudder Court, and lead to the accumulation of arrears. If this should eventually appear to be the case, it will be necessary to increase the strength of the Court; but the time which will be saved by the discontinuance of references from one Sudder Court to another, may possibly be found to afford sufficient leisure for the disposal of these suits. The delay to suitors is a more serious consideration. The Sudder Court will scarcely be able to decide the special appeals with as much rapidity as the Zillah Judges; but the delay will be diminished by that provision of the new law which limits the Court to the examination of those specific points of law on which the appeal is based, and forbids the Judges to open afresh the whole question of law and fact. Against the inconvenience to individual suitors must be placed the general advantage to the community of having these legal constructions settled by the highest judicial authority, and of giving them a character of uniformity.

It will be necessary however to make some further alterations in our judicial system, to accommodate it to the new order of things. The decisions of the Sudder Ameen and Mooniffs will now be subject to a regular appeal before the Zillah Judge and the Principal Sudder Ameen, and a special appeal to the Sudder. The decisions of the Principal Sudder Ameen in cases within 5000 Rs. will be appealable to the Zillah Judge also, and from his decree a special appeal will lie to the Sudder. But all cases between 5000 and 10,000 Rupees, will be excluded from the benefit of a second or special appeal; because the regular appeal lies to the Sudder Court, and no further appeal is admissible to the Privy Council. To correct this anomaly, it appears necessary to allow an appeal to the Zillah Judge from the Principal Sudder Ameen in all cases under 10,000 Rupees. Such cases will then come by special appeal to the Sudder, while suits of the value of 10,000 Rupees, and beyond that sum, will be heard by regular appeal before that Court, and again in appeal before the Judicial Committee at home.

THE OLD HINDOO versus THE FRIEND OF INDIA.—An Old Hindoo, engaged as he tells us in heavy commercial duties, who is enriching the columns of the Hurkars with a series of Essays on the grievances of India, has suspended his patriotic labours to breathe his censure upon us. In the second number of the grievances, published in the pages of our contemporary on the 8th of the present month, he has given a running commentary on an article which appeared in this journal, on the address of the Mookerjee Bahoo, and prefaced it with some remarks, which seem to outrun Cobbet's remark that a good patriot must begin with being a good hater. His hatred is directed partly against ourselves, but chiefly against the institutions under the protection of which he is accumulating wealth. If we were to say that we regret to find how completely he has contrived to lose his temper in the discussion, we might be suspected of insincerity, for there are few things which a public writer is supposed to be more thankful for than the interposition of his opponent. He says that we have been raving for some time under the influence of a terrible night mare. His essay is adorned with other compliments equally flattering, which we can scarcely venture to quote lest we should be suspected also of vanity. We therefore dismiss at once, without further comment, all that relates to ourselves personally.

One great disadvantage connected with a man's losing his temper is, that his judgment is obscured, and he becomes for a time disqualified to distinguish between what is true and what is not so. Of this the Old Hindoo furnishes a lamentable example. To what other cause than the loss of judgment consequent on the loss of temper, are we to attribute such assertions as these,—that the people are more wretched under the British than they were under the Mahomedan administration; that the British Government has degraded the natives to the condition of slaves—that up to these few days it has patronised slavery in its worst form—that it has passed unjust and tyrannical laws—that all the legislation of British India has been made by Hindoo pundits—that nothing can be improved to the corruption of the natives,—that this corruption is fostered by the Civilian, because if the natives were honest, their occupations would cease,—that the civilian endeavours by every means in his power to promote the corruption of the natives, because if the natives were honest, the English people would direct them to be employed, and what would the Directors then do for a livelihood?—that the language of the Orientals is a continued hyperbole, and that when the laws of Manoo directed that melted lead should be poured down the throat of any man who slandered a Brahmin, nothing more was meant than that "some slight punishment which was due in justice to the offender should be inflicted." When he says that the language of the Orientals is a continued hyperbole, he explains much that would otherwise appear unaccountable in his own letter. Coupled with this censure of the British Government, he gives a lofty panegyric of the Mahomedan rule. "They encouraged learning by large endowments"—only these endowments were bestowed exclusively on the Mullas and Muffis and not on the Brahmins. "A Rajah was Prince minister, and another was a Governor of Bugel"—only he had turned Mussulman first. "They made no distinction between Moslems and Hindoos,"—only they preferred the Hindoos, because a Mahomedan was like a slave, and the wealth he acquired was lost through the intricacies, whereas a Hindoo was like a sponge, which might be always squeezed to advantage. "They had one set of laws"—only it was the law of the Korm, and the Hindoo law, which we revived, was in abeyance for five centuries; and "they had only one Court of Justice"—in which a Hindoo was never allowed to preside.

In one respect the Old Hindoo has done us injustice. He says, we have endeavored to frighten his countrymen by calling their proceedings treasonable; and saying that such meetings, alluding, as he affirms we do, to the assembly at Shreebhoo Baboo's house where Mr. George Thompson presided, if held at Patna or Samargan, would have ensured the speaker and members transportation to Almoyna. Now we did not allude to the meetings at the Baboo's house, but to a meeting at the Sangkrit College, at which Mr. George Thompson was not present. Yet it is a fact, and not an opinion, that there is no other colony of any European power in which such language as that to which we referred would not be treated as seditious. Under the British Government it is treated with indifference—we will not say with contempt. That Government has come unharmed through a more formidable opposition at a more important crisis. The language of the Mookjeejee Baboo, and the Old Hindoo in its most terrific strain, is mild, when compared with the denunciations of the Mahomedan press at a time when it was supposed that the combination formed in Central Asia, under the auspices of Russia,—we are adopting the language of the Mussulman leaders—would sweep us into the sea. Indeed the Calcutta movement is so entirely innocuous in a political point of view, that if etiquette did not forbid it, Mr. Bird might with abundant impunity give up the Hall as Government House for the meeting, and honour it with his own presence. But when the Old Hindoo hints at an appeal to the French, he must excuse us for reminding him that any thing which militates against the allegiance which the Natives owe to the British Crown, is by law treasonable; only the treason is entirely neutralised by the folly of the appeal. To assert that if the Natives had enjoyed the blessings of the French Revolution, they would by this time have been treated like men, and assumed a proper position among the nations of the earth, is to write absolute nonsense. Let him read Thiers and Alison before he again ventures to long for a revolution which would have turned the Moolgully into a revolutionary torrent, and established a permanent gillotine in Tank Square.

It is the smallest glory of the British Government that it is superior to the Mahomedan Governments which preceded it. If with the advantages it enjoys of higher illumination, political and religious, it could claim no higher credit, however it might deserve the commendation of the natives, with their limited experience, it would be unworthy the graces of Christendom. What else would it be to say that a Christian nation, foremost in the ranks of civilisation, had not desecrated the temples and mutilated the images of a vanquished people; that it was not in the habit of dragging the country gentlemen to the gallows to pay their arrears, through a pond filled with the most intolerable filth; that the richest bankers in the kingdom had not been carried into captivity and then hurried from a precipice to find a grave in the river? The only Hindoo historian we have, says that the last of the Nabobs of Moorsheebad in the year preceding the battle of Plassey, amused himself by ripping open pregnant women that he might satisfy his curiosity, and with drowning men by dozens in empty boats that he might enjoy the spectacle of their dying agonies. It would be almost a reflection on our national honour had we no higher claim to the gratitude of the natives than the merit of having abstained from such cruelties.

The glory of the British administration hitherto appeared to us—and we have had some opportunity of watching its progress for thirty years—to consist in its gradually overcoming those prejudices which once predominated in it. We compare it with itself at successive periods, and we find abundant cause to congratulate India on its existence. The country fell to us by a train of unexpected circumstances at a period when every nation in Europe considered foreign possessions valuable only as they ministered to the wealth and power of the conquerors; when the interests of the conquered were of no account; when the benighted political maxims in Fencelon's Telemaque, which are now considered common place, were regarded as Quixotic. That age has passed away; its doctrines have long since been exploded, and it is now admitted as an axiom that we hold the Government of India as a trust for the benefit of its children. This axiom is the vital principle of our administration. The history of our rule in India for the last half century is a history of constant and steady progress. The liberal principles upon which the government is now conducted would have been deemed by the statesmen of past days utterly incompatible with the stability of the empire. The abolition of slavery throughout India would have disturbed the repose of Warren Hastings. A meeting in Calcutta at which the British Government should be attacked as it has been by a Mookjeejee Baboo would have been dispersed by force without the slightest hesitation, in the days of Lord Wellesley. The education of the people, even on its present very limited scale, would have been deemed dangerous in the days of Lord Minto. The liberty of the press we now enjoy would have alarmed Lord Amherst more than an invasion of the Burmah. The whole policy of the British Government in India has undergone so entire a change that we can scarcely recognise a single principle which is common to the first conquerors of the country and its present administrators. This amelioration has been the result not of any individual feelings of benevolence in any one Governor General, which his successors might be at liberty to abandon, but of the steady growth of sound and just principles in the administration itself. Since we entered on this career, there has been no retrograde movement; and the most despotic ruler would no more dream of abolishing our Colleges, or limiting the enjoyment of offices of trust to Europeans, or gagging the press, than Sir Robert Peel would dream of reviving the Star Chamber and the High Commission Court. This progressive principle of improvement is so interwoven with the system of our administration, that even the misuses of their advantages and privileges by a small fraction of educated youths in Calcutta will produce no sinister effect. The fierce denunciations to which the Government happens just now to be exposed, will not be permitted for a moment to turn it from the course of its wise policy. Gevernment will not allow the ingratitude of a few to become the measure of its duty towards the many. There are others who know how to appreciate the blessings which the British Government has conferred on India, and who will assist it by their advice and experience in multiplying those blessings. To the frothy declamation of the Mookjeejee Baboo, to the wild appeal of the Old Hindoo to the French, we oppose the deliberate opinion of a greater man than either—Dwarkanath Tagore, who on leaving England in company with Mr. George Thompson, said to the Court of Directors:

"I have worked in my humble sphere under a firm conviction that the happiness of India is best secured by her connexion with your own great and glorious country, and that the more the people of that vast empire were enlightened, the more sensible they would become of the invincible power of the protecting state, and of the excellence of a Government, whose pure and benevolent intentions, whose noble solicitude for the welfare and improvement of the millions committed by Providence to its charge, may challenge the admiration of the whole world."

This article has run out involuntarily to such length, that we cannot find room for examining in detail the fifteen recipes for the removal of those wrongs under which "hapless and forsaken India" is now groaning. The author of the "Grievances of India," No. 2, must revise them before they can be seriously discussed. Thus, he requires that two members of the Imperial Parliament should be given to each Presidency; forgetting that no sooner had the members embarked, than a meeting would be called to turn them out of society. He demands the abolition of all state pensions, without remembering that for every Pension of Pension a European receives from the revenues of India, the Natives receive twenty. He wants a Vagrant Act before he has made any provision for the tens of thousands of religious mendicants of his own religion. His plans are crude, and indigestible. He must give up his heavy commercial duties for a year, and apply himself diligently to the science of Government, before he can produce a constitution worth looking at.

THE UNION BANK.—The Report of the Committee appointed to investigate the transactions of the Union Bank with the extinct firm of Gilmore and Co. has been presented to the Proprietors, and the Secretary has placed on record his own reply to it. In a weekly journal, with limited space, and many demands upon it, we cannot make room for these voluminous documents, and must therefore confine ourselves to a brief notice of them.

The Report of the Committee discloses a series of transactions, for which the all-confiding public was by no means prepared. It shows that property has been pledged to the Bank which never had an existence; that bills of Exchange have been hypothecated to the Bank for large sums, when they were known by the borrowers to be waste paper; that loans have been raised on goods to which the parties had no uncontested access, which they used without any reference to the dictates of morality; and that British produce on board a vessel in the river was pawned to the Bank, and a portion of that produce unscrupulously abstracted. The transactions which the Committee have dragged to light are any thing but creditable to the British or the Christian character, and they seem to have led to the conviction that the good faith, to which the Bank has hitherto traded with the utmost confidence in its dealings with the mercantile community, has broken down, and that its negotiations must hereafter be conducted on the sterner principle of commercial mistrust.

The Report appears to us to have singled out the Secretary, with somewhat of an ungenerous severity in order to fix on him the odium of transactions which have ended in loss. There is something like a disposition to turn upon him alone that current of indignation which should be directed rather against the Directors, but still more against the system of the Bank. It is advantageous—at least to us—that the names of the Directors were not surrendered to the Committee; for as we are happily ignorant of them, we can allude to their official conduct without any danger of personality.

It appears that the Bank has for a series of years been far too much under the control of a body of commercial men, who have distributed its funds rather with reference to the wants of their friends and mercantile associates, than to the interests of the Proprietors. The Directors appear from the very origin of the Institution to have allowed its affairs to be conducted upon a very loose and hazy system; and to have trusted far more to the honour of the lenders, than to the intrinsic value of the security they offered. This is acknowledged by all parties. When the present Secretary came into office, he, like his predecessor, pointed out the dangers of the system which was then in vogue. The words of the former Secretary are remarkable; they give us in one short paragraph a thorough insight into the system which has just been exposed by the Committee, in time to save the Bank from ruin.

"There is besides those, another class of security, if such it can be called, when the goods are never seen, nor their existence ascertained by any party on behalf of the Bank. It is a sure in any way that such loans are made on deposit of goods, yet often having obtained accommodation on such terms in the first instance, with two or three renewals, it would, no doubt, be taking as ground of mutual offence, if any thing more substantial were now to be required."

To have demanded any thing more substantial than the security which the Directors were shut in the habit of accepting, which security the Secretary himself declared to be a farce would have been taken as a ground of mutual offence. This is indeed a fine position, for a Secretary to be placed in. The Directors help their friends to loans on the deposit of goods, when the goods are never seen, and their existence identified by no party on behalf of the Bank; and yet were the Secretary to urge it on the Directors to terminate the farce, and demand substantial security, instead of receiving their thanks, he would run the risk of giving offence. Mr. Gordon has endeavoured, and not without success, to remedy this state of things. Perhaps he has not done all that he might have done. Perhaps he ought to have made a bolder stand against a system which has in the long run have brought the Bank to the ground. Yet we all know how difficult it must be for a man to place himself in a state of opposition to those whom he is called to set with, and to set under. It is not generous to throw the whole blame of these losses on the man who endeavoured to correct the vices of the system. It would, we think, have been more equitable in every instance in which the Committee have used the word Seign- itary, to have used the term Bank. It looks somewhat like an attempt to screen the real offenders by presenting the ministerial officer as a scape-goat, for there is little reason to doubt that in the disposal of the funds of the Bank to merchants and speculators, the voice of the Directors has always predominated over that of the Secretary.

Yet we cordially unite with Mr. Taiton in saying, let "bye gones be bye gones." In the particular case now exposed there has been dishonour to the parties, discredit to the Directors and Secretary for their laxity; and loss to the proprietors of five lakhs of Rupees. But this loss will be a gain, if it serves to save fifty lakhs, which it is most likely to do. The present lesson will not be soon forgotten. The storm which has now burst, will serve to purify the atmosphere of the Bank. Business will in future be conducted on safer and sounder principles, and the Bank itself will regain that place in the confidence of the public which it once enjoyed. But the Proprietors must not look for more than six, or at the utmost for seven per cent. dividends, if they are determined to allow their funds to be embarked in no speculations connected with risk. It is by endeavouring to swell itself twice a year to the size of the Bank of England, which is fastened by a Government monopoly, that the Union Bank has injured itself. That Chartered Bank gives its proprietary body the benefit of the profits of a double capital. The Union Bank cannot give the same interest, except by embarking in undertakings of doubtful expediency. But Union Bank Shares at a premium of ten per cent., when it gives a dividend of seven per cent., afford just as good an investment for capital as Bengal Bank Shares when they give twelve per cent. with a premium of sixty per cent.

THE GATES.—The Procession of the Gates is yet the most striking feature in the administration of Lord Ellenborough; and it may possibly continue to be remembered, when other and greater events have been forgotten. Independently of this circumstance, the importance which his Lordship appears to attach to them, will be a sufficient warrant for our recording their progress from station to station, till they reach the sea shore, or are arrested in their progress by orders from England.

Our latest advices left them at Brindabun, the residence of holy Brahmins and sacred monkeys. His Lordship appears to have taken this place and Muttra on his way to Agra, and to have passed some time in examining their wonders. The Gates followed in his train, and we are told that they were unveiled on their arrival; that both the Brahmins and the baboons crowded to see them, and that they were to remain there for three days to gratify the curiosity of the devotees both rational and irrational. What opportunity not Landseer have given for the opportunity of witnessing this rich and interesting sight! It would scarcely be possible even for his fertile imagination to do justice to a scene of which he has never been exhibited before, and is never likely to be exhibited again. He has drawn many monkeys with inimitable humour; but he has never seen any thing to compare with the sacred monkeys of Brindabun, as they passed and glided with superstitious nupture on those Gates of sensual wood. There can be little doubt that he will not allow so picturesque a scene to escape him; but he should have been on the spot to catch the spirit of the thing.

Mr. Pfander tells us in his journal, appended to the last report of the Church Missionary Society, that when Lord Auckland visited this spot, he gave a Hundred Rupees among the priests, and that they have since persisted in representing the gift as a proof of the Governor General's respect for that shrine. The next Governor General visits them with the Gates of Somnath in his train, covered with the richest trappings, escorted by a Military guard, and treated with a degree of reverence which cannot fail to make a deep impression on the native mind. After the visit of the gates, we fear the Missionary may preach for ten years in vain at Mattra and Brindabun.

It is thus our great men unconsciously foster a superstition, which is the grand cause of national degradation, and which must be eradicated before India can take up her position among civilized nations. It is thus that the injunctions of the Court of Directors are disregarded, and the influence of the state bestowed on the encouragement of idolatry and priestcraft.

THE NEW MAGISTRATE OF HOWRAH.—Among the minor improvements effected by Government, we must not omit to notice the establishment of a separate Magistral jurisdiction in the suburbs of Calcutta across the water. This measure has been so long required on the principle of justice and common sense, and has been so repeatedly petitioned for by the public and the public press, that it is only marvellous it has been delayed to the present time. Within the last twenty-five years the city of Calcutta has swelled to a great extent beyond its original limits, and our "borough of Southwark" has grown almost to the size of a town; but the old judicial arrangements, which were made when it was only a hamlet, have continued without alteration. The Criminal Court has continued to be held on the Calcutta side of the water; and the sessions for justice have been obliged to cross a river rendered particularly dangerous by a forest of shipping. This inconvenience has now been removed. A separate Magistrate has been appointed for the trans-Hooghly suburb, and justice is brought to the door of the poor and the oppressed. It is much to be desired that a similar arrangement could be made in other parts of the country where a broad and dangerous river runs through the Magistral jurisdiction. During a third of the year the people cannot obtain justice, but at the risk of their lives. In all such cases, the Magistrate should be separated into two divisions and a Magistrate's Court established on either side of the river.

Advantages have also been taken of this change to cut off from the jurisdiction of Hooghly those channels which lay to the south, at so great a distance from the seat of the Magistrate as to be virtually beyond his control, and to annex them to the Court of Howrah. The district of Hooghly therefore no longer extends through one degree and a half of latitude from Santipore in the North, to Fort Mornington, in sight of Diamond Harbour, in the South.

We return many thanks to the friend who has favoured us with the scheme of a rail road, which was submitted recently to the Court of Directors. We had intended to take up the subject in the present number, but to do justice to it we must give the entire plan, which we cannot do before the next week, as the important intelligence from Simla occupies all our room.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 9.

—The Bombay Times, which reached us to-day, to be of service in our last issue, announces a great victory by Sir Charles Napier over the army of Scinde, in which 23,000 Native troops were opposed to 2701 British troops. For particulars we refer to our extracts. The conflict was obstinately maintained for three hours; the exchange, extraordinary; the victory, most signal.

—The Star states, that a party of gentlemen, commanders of vessels engaged in the transport service in China, dined together at Spencer's, and after dinner discussed the propriety of opening a subscription for those who had suffered during the war. The transports were often exposed to the full fire of the enemy, and many of the officers and men received injuries which have disabled them for life. Had they been in the regular service of Government, ample provision would have been made for them; but they have no legal claim on the state, and must pass the remainder of their lives in misery and want, unless some means of relief can be devised. A subscription was commenced and 500 Rs. put down immediately. The owners and commanders of ships have responded with a golden harvest in this war; and it becomes them to devote some portion of their gains to the relief of those who suffered on board their vessels.

—From the same paper we learn, that the united body of the Trevelyan service have petitioned Government for some modification of the regulations which apply to them. They are subject to many privations. Their subsistence are not their own. They are confined uninterruptedly to the vessel, and have only a day or two in the month for intercourse with their families. When absent a day through illness, half their pay is cut. Their own is hard one, and calls for the humane interposition of their employers.

—The meeting of the Mechanics' Institute held on Tuesday, was numerously attended by ladies and gentlemen, Europeans and Natives. Mr. George Thompson delivered an address on Mechanics Institutions, which the Rev. Mr. Morton promised to translate into Bengalee. That gentleman also addressed the meeting, and said that though Mr. Thompson had some overdose on the subject of Indian politics, he was free to avow that all he had heard that evening had his entire assent.

Mr. Thompson replied to Mr. Morton in an extempore speech. The most remarkable expression in it was the assurance that every opinion he had formed of the Government of India at home had been confirmed, and none of them altered, since his arrival here. Mr. Thompson's best friends cannot but regret the use of so very unguarded an expression. We learn from the Harbinger, that the harmony of the meeting was disturbed by the brutal conduct of some ruffians, whose name is not mentioned.

—Mr. Buxley is obliged by ill health to visit the Cape; and his departure creates three acting appointments: which is to be regretted, though we see how it could be avoided. Mr. Davidson officiates for him as Secretary; Mr. Harvey as Secretary; Mr. Davidson as Commissioner; Mr. Currie officiates for Mr. Harvey as Collector of Sea Customs; and some body must officiate for Mr. Currie as Secretary to the Revenue Board.

FRIDAY, MARCH 10.

—We have no farther information from Bombay regarding the signal victory of Hyderabad. The Star has a letter from that neighbourhood, which states that all the wounded officers were being well cared for; and that a force was immediately to be despatched from Bombay to strengthen Major Napier, who is but inadequately supplied with troops for so arduous a task as that of maintaining peace in a country where every man is on foot. This precaution is necessary whether the country is retained or not. Not a syllable is said about the treasures of Hyderabad, which have been stated at the most moderate computation to exceed fifteen millions sterling, the largest amount of prize money which ever fell to the lot of an army. The Spanish galleons, which used to be considered the richest prizes in the world, were nothing to this Treasury of Hyderabad.

—A most determined case of murder and suicide has just been perpetrated in Calcutta by one Dobson, an officiating preventive officer. He had been married some months to a widow of whose he was jealous, perhaps with, perhaps without cause. He was given to the bottle, he was in debt, and his goods had been distrained. This combination of causes unseated reason. He came home from the ship without leave, a little elevated with liquor on Wednesday last, halted the door, and first blew out his wife's brains, and then his own. The jury found a verdict of wilful murder and felix de se.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11.

—The Bombay Times, which arrived yesterday, has fuller particulars respecting the great victory obtained over the Scinde Army by General Napier, the whole of which we have transferred to our columns. The Editor has given a brief notice of the cause of hostilities. The Amers refused to give up any portion of their hunting grounds on the banks of the Indus for the navigation of that stream. These Sikh regiments have been established by the most infamous oppression, by the razing up of villages, and the displacement of the wretched inhabitants. They have now become the cause of the overthrow of the Talpurs dynasty. Major Outram, but gone on to Hyderabad, and the Times intimates that he will return to England forthwith.

It must be a very short-sighted policy in the Government to allow a man of Major Outram's qualifications, and one so thoroughly acquainted with Scinde, to quit India at such an emergency.

—A Correspondent of the Englishman, Bombay, has sent a letter to the Times extolling the courage of Messrs. Rustomjee Gonsalves and Co. in determining to protect the Chief Justice of the Goanese Republic, and in refusing to allow him to be displaced. But Buckley does not explain why the firm spontaneously offered to sacrifice him, in their letter to Government.

—The Governor General has ordered two Police battalions to be organized for service in India, on the same principle as those which have been just established in the Sagar and Verdule territories. The gallant Major Fergusson, who obtained so high a reputation in the Afghan campaign, has been placed at the head of them.

SUNDAY, MARCH 12.

—The Lottery is about to be assigned to the tomb, without a single expression of regret on the part of any public writer. Every editor has cordially joined in congratulation on the abatement of this nuisance. We believe we are correct in saying that the lottery has lately, under Capt. Hyde's management, been made profitable; and that the abolition is not final till the Court in Londonhall Street shall have sanctioned Mr. Bick's Act. One writer in the Harbinger hints at the possibility of the establishment of a lottery up here. We think his fears are visionary. We will venture it is that the Danish authorities will not take up an objectionable institution which the British Government has abandoned for its immoral tendency.

—The Governor General reached Agra on the 4th instant, and took up his residence in the Fort. We have extracted from the Agra Utkar a long account of this event.

—It is pleasing to learn that the regular Mail of the 20th February reached Bombay in time for the March Steamer, the same day with the Express. The number of letters despatched from Bombay on the 1st of March was 27,511; of Europe, 10,607; India, 17,774. This Mail will convey to England the first intelligence of the unexpected battle of Hyderabad.

—The Bombay papers state that the report of Sir George Arthur's having declined the invitation of Native, thereby making an inviolable distinction between them and Europeans, is altogether unfounded. He has accepted invitations to all the recent parties, except in one instance in which indisposition constrained him to remain at home; and this case was distinctly assigned for his non-attendance.

—The account of Akbar Khan's having returned Capt. Traup's horse is correct. The Dell's Gazette states, that while he was at Delhi, a messenger arrived from Akbar with two letters, one to the Governor General, the other for Capt. Traup himself. They were both sent to Lord Ellenborough, where the Captain's letter unfolded, and told him he might keep the horse.

—The same paper states that the Governor General's Agent has been instructed to withhold the answer or present usually offered to the Emperor at Delhi on the part of Government.

TUESDAY, MARCH 14.

—A numerous meeting of native householders has been held at the Police office, in consequence of the requisition of Government, relative to the working of Act 21 of 1819; the object of which was to develop the municipal arrangements of Calcutta on the householders. No attempt has since been made on the part either of natives or Europeans to carry the Act into effect. At this meeting, Baboo Anandoy Day being in the Chair, it was resolved, that it is considered expedient to undertake the duties of Assessment, Collection and management of the rates of the Town. A Sub-Committee of twelve have been appointed who will meet on Monday to prepare a report on the subject.

—The Devi Chandroo, which came in yesterday, gives little addition to the intelligence received from Scinde, except that the Satellite Steamer, was able to take up a position on the river flank of the enemy whence her guns did serious execution among them.

—The Parson Chandroo, after passing a junk among the members of the Theero family, who have declared themselves as Tagore's family because he has visited Europe, says that their names are to be struck off the Government House list. We believe he is altogether misinformed.

—Capt P. Nicholson, lately in attendance upon Dost Mahomed, having returned to the province, on the Asker's quitting Lahore, has been placed at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief. Capt. Nicholson, is among those who enjoyed the patronage of our late Governor General. He is not likely to be replaced on the staff for sometime to come.

—The Star of this morning has some very apposite remarks on the newly constructed Police Institution. Such establishments are admirably adapted for countries like Sagar or Hindustan, where a spirit of resistance to public authority has been so lately manifested, but it is much to be doubted whether the evils of a defective Police in the more respectable districts will be cured by giving a military organization to the constabulary force. What we intended to point out in this very brief notice is, that in our short sentence our contemporary has alluded to a change greater than any which the Government has yet made in India, and one which, however beneficial, could not be effected without producing the deepest and most extensive ill will. We allude to the remark that "the funds now lettable for the village watch which in many instances are unprofitably expended and abused, might advantageously be made available for this object."

—We are happy to learn from the Harbinger, that Mr. George Plowden, the present Collector of Sylhet, is now selected to fill the post, ad interim, of Secretary to the Board of Revenue.

—The Harbinger states, that a very learned antiquary attached to the British Court, has predicted that the Comet will occasion a tremendous inundation, fifteen days after its first appearance. It became visible with its perturbation on Sunday, the 6th, a few hours after Mr.

and after posting the necessary sentries around the camp, and despatching a comrade to Carmichael's assistance, the ladies retired to rest. The Belooches, however, did not make their appearance that night. Before I pressed any further, I think it best to let you know the real strength, when you will be able to imagine the consternation these rumours put us in, and the awful predicament we were placed in. Our party was as follows:—Mr. Stanley, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley, with a child two months old, Mrs. Greenway and mother-in-law (stationed at Tatta), Mrs. Bea and two children, and Mr. and Mrs. Maher, proceeding to Sukkur, Benegal, Davao, and three Europeans, and the Native guard above alluded to together with 8 or 10 servants completed our strength. The carpenter of the Misrod, by the bye, who was left at Tatta, to repair a boat belonging to him, we supplied with a musket and pouch, and transformed him into a soldier. The next day (Friday) word was brought in that the Belooches, to the number of 500, were then at Tatta, that they were menacently expecting an order from the Amirs to attack us, and that they were to go to work and erect a battery of all the available stores, both Government and private, and after digging a trench all round, two feet deep and four feet wide, we pitched our tents, and the ladies, male and female all huddled together prepared to bivouac there for the night. At five in the evening a Salak and three Sepoys, on special duty from Kurach, came in and told that the towns of Tatta was crowded with Belooches armed to the teeth, and that they would be on us that very night. This was another addition to our party, but they had left their arms behind them. Major Dawson, however, had 7 extra muskets and pouches with 40 rounds of ammunition in each, which we distributed to the men in our line as they arrived. The son of the Collector Hicks, a little boy seven or eight years old, was brought in on the back of a donkey. He is a very intelligent child, and is a native of the hills. He was proceeding in charge of ordnance stores to Sukkur, was attacked by a host of Belooches, a few miles this side of Hyderabad, a laboratory man and his wife accompanied him, and the boats containing Government stores taken to Hyderabad. A few of us party, after being stripped to their skin, contrived to make their escape, a mercy when we had no arms but a knife.

While following the course of the river on our way back to Tatta, to their surprise they found that they had been overtaken by a party of Belooches, when Mr. Hicks, and his wife, and the little boy, the jungle to conceal themselves. His son, with two or three Natives, the Belooches overtook; and forcing the child from his father, and holding the poor little fellow in the air in one arm, with a drawn sword in the other, they would have torn him down for being a little foreigner, had not the men begged and prayed of them to spare him. A great many words having been exchanged on both sides, our men with the child were allowed to pass unmolested, and the Belooches retraced their steps to the boats as it was supposed; but as neither Mr. Hicks nor the Sepoys have yet made their appearance, there is every fear that they were traced by the Belooches and murdered. Four persons, who were at the way to Hyderabad, returned at the same time as very nearly, and informed us that they found it impossible to proceed on their way. They then, without any delay, returned to our party. Information was brought in at Tatta that 400 Belooches had marched on Garamba, at the mouth of the river, for the purpose of plundering the Government stores, and holding the station the French were stationed. Friday night, a severe storm over as the former had done, having us in an increasing suspense of momentary expectation of being attacked, without the means of defending ourselves. About nine o'clock on Saturday morning, while a few were trying to make the best of a broken boat, they could get word was brought that the Belooches had left the town of Tatta, and were on their way to our camp. All our supplies were stopped, and we could not get the most trifling news from them, even returning for it with our lives. A Banyan who was bringing in a little food and glass, was caught and severely beaten.

"About an hour after, more enough, the Belooches were coming in extra. They formed into three parties, about 80 or 90 in each, and took three different routes to surround our camp—some mounted and others on foot. The latter were the first to proceed to the bunker and threaten every man with death if a boat was permitted to make any way down the river. While in this state, a retreat to Kurach was proposed, but was eagerly seconded to, as it was too certain that their attacking us, had we stood a shot and wounded or killed one of their men, not one of us would have lived to tell the tale. Spies, in the morning, were watching every motion of ours, and twenty minutes had not elapsed before our abandoning the place, and everything was in possession of it in the world, before our tents and baggage were covered with seven hundred Belooches."

"But more of our retreat by and bye. The word is to come yet. We have, however, all arrived safe with the exception of two officers and two native servants. I shall continue this to-morrow, and forward it by post. I can hardly write more, so you must excuse me."

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—May I request the favour of your giving a small room in your most valuable and popular paper for the general information of the following translation of the Bombay Proposito da Liberdade dated Saturday, the 18th February, 1848.

I remain, Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

For the information of the bogglers, and of the curious who, without the least interest, or predilection, have always importuned us, questioning about the negotiation in and out between the Court of Portugal and of Rome we have copied an article we found in the Journal received in the last steamer which reached Suva, and was extracted from Proposito da Liberdade, a Gazette written in Italian which can be easily understood by our friends the Proposito, and if they choose without expense read therein the news arrived from Portugal, and not state hereafter that it has been forged in our office.

THE SPECTER OF A MESSIAH.—We (Widows) have been not a little struck by the following passage in a recently published letter from the Bishop of Calcutta. It breathes a determination to the cause of Christ among the perishing heathen, which cannot but excite admiration, and we trust, imitation also.

"But I have renounced the prospect of visiting you any more in England before I shall have seen His Grace the Archbishop supply his orders upon me, India is my scene of duty, delight, and usefulness. The excitement of a short visit would prevent me at any time of this life if I can but find any excuse to delay, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God, I shall have renounced. Already have I in my mind the words of the apostle, 'I shall be as a man of blood and death.' The climate of England would not probably, not suit me; and the joy of my family would break my heart; the voyage is and will be without any remains of strength. I must not therefore, tempt God, but be content with the treasures of letters and the communion of the saints in prayer and intercession. Three years ago, I was set upon going home, my feelings have been subdued by a sense of duty greatly altered. Where should a Bishop die, but in his diocese?"—Pat.

THE CHARACTER OF THE DEGENERACY OF THE EARLY CHURCH.—The outward show of a nation, and external splendour of a monarch, are the internal and spiritual unity, which is the very essence of the religion of God. I am forewarned the previous portions of faith, and the moral character of the empty vessel which had contained it. With the decay of faith as a governing principle, some other was sought for; and the members of the Church thus came to be bound together by means of bishop, archbishop, pope, maffre, ceremonies, and canons. The living Church, having gradually retired into the secluded sanctuary of some solitary spots, its place was taken by an external Church, which was thereupon destined to be of Divine institution. Salvation no longer streaming from the new hidden word, it was held to be transmitted through the medium of humanly-invented forms, and that none should press to its source without that conveyance (as both Pagan and Jewish held). No man, it was said, can by his own faith attain to everlasting life. It was the duty of the Church, as the Holy Ghost to the apostles, the apostles to the bishops, and the Holy Ghost dwells in that order of things. In primitive times, whoever held the Spirit of Jesus Christ was a member of the Church; but now the inversion of terms took place, and it was pretended that he alone who was a member of the Church received the Spirit of Jesus Christ.—D. Ashurst's Ref., Scott's Ed. 1848.

—SCIENTIFIC EDUCATION.—A long debate has taken place in the Town Council in Liverpool on the following motion made with the view of the Corporation retaining their steps in this important matter. The motion was made by Mr. C. J. Wilson, and was to the effect:—"That it be referred to the Committee to consider whether, after establishing in the Corporation Schools a system of religious instruction, based on the principles of the Church of England, and, in all respects, in strict accordance with her tenets, such a modification cannot be made in the existing rules and regulations as to enable the Corporation to receive the services of the poor, professing different religious opinions, by allowing their children the secular instruction of the schools, the parents giving an assurance to the Corporation that the religious instruction shall not be neglected." Upon a division, it was carried by 39 to 20. "Although," says the Liverpool Times, "the resolution of Mr. G. H. Lawrence, in favour of admitting the children of Roman Catholics to the advantages of a good general education in the Corporation Schools, has been lost by a large majority, yet it has had the effect of drawing the attention of the Conservative members of that assembly an opportunity of serving their protest against the bigotry and exclusiveness of the present system. An angry note was also sent to the Mayor (Mr. G. H. Lawrence), brother of Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. G. H. Lawrence, the most intimate of Lord John's friends and supporters, together with Mr. Ambrose Lane, Mr. Henry Lawrence, and Mr. Alderman Turner, five gentlemen of excellent judgment and moderate opinions. These all voted in favour of Mr. Lawrence's motion; and, in addition to them, Mr. Bell spoke strongly in favour of admitting the Roman Catholic children, though he objected to the plan proposed by Mr. Lawrence; and Mr. Alderman Need (who was not present) also spoke in favour of the plan then continued on the present plan. As Mr. John Smith and Mr. Robinson had previously avowed a similar opinion, this makes nine of the Conservative members of the Council who have entered their protest against the present system. A bill it is necessary to bring over many more converts, as a little more discussion"—Pat.

SCANDAL.—We received the proclamation issued by Lord Ellenborough on hearing of the battle of Hyderabad, just in time to insert it in our last issue; but were unable to offer any remarks upon it. It appears evident from the tenor of this document that His Lordship intends to keep the country, "a Victory has placed at the disposal of the British Government"—not as formerly at the disposal of the Governor General—"the country on both banks of the Indus from Sukkur to the sea. The power, which victory has thus given, will be used in the manner most conducive to the prosperity of the people of Scinde, so long misgoverned;" and this can be accomplished only by giving them a better system of Government. His Lordship also intends that the crime of treachery in Princes shall be punished in such a manner as may deter all from its commission. If the Princes are to be made an example of, this cannot be effected by restoring to them the Government of their country. It appears evident, therefore, that the territories thus placed at our disposal, will be made an integral part of the British dominions; and there are few who will not rejoice at an arrangement by which the interests of humanity will be so effectually promoted. No prince in India ever fell from power amidst fewer regrets than the Amiers of Scinde. The worst managed district under the British administration is better governed than the country of Scinde has been under their rule. No princes have made so selfish a use of their authority, or manifested so entire a disregard of the interests of their subjects. Under no dynasty have the people pined away, or the country itself become so desolate as under the Talpoots. Every benevolent mind will rejoice to find that the royal hunting grounds are to be converted into smiling fields and happy villages; that the navigation of the Indus will not be disturbed by so hostility, and that this silent stream, which presents so gloomy a contrast to the Ganges, crowded with vessels of every description, will in a few years be animated with a busy traffic. Bombay will find a new and profitable outlet for its redundant capital and be enabled to apply it to the revival and extension of commerce in this neglected region.

The treachery of the Amiers, who had signed the treaty with the British representatives on the 14th, and the next day led on their troops to an assault on his residence, argues to afford a sufficient justification of the course which has been pursued. No objection was taken to the British authorities after such an act of perfidy, but to advance on the capital, or to retreat at the risk of being exterminated. The terms of the treaty dictated by the Governor General, may have been unpalatable,—though there is at present no evidence that under all the circumstances of the case they were unjust—but after they had been accepted by the Amiers, and the attack on Major Ochterlony was an act which demanded the most condign punishment. The Amiers are not indifferent to the guilt and mischief of bad faith of their own cases, for they made it a plea for dismissing the officers sent on the Mission to them in 1808, that an attempt had been made by two vakeels from Jeypore to assassinate one of the Amiers at a public levee. That treasons they have now perpetrated of their own accord by their cowardly attack on the Residency, while Major Outram, relying on the faith of a treaty, was guarded only by a handful men. The casus belli appears therefore to be quite as clear as that which led to the detachment of the Pathans, after his treacherous assault on Mr. Elphinstone.

The despatch of General Napier is a vigorous description of a vigorous action. It is simple, clear, and business like, and will lose but little by comparison even with those well known dispatches of Sir Robert Sale, which is the opinion of our home Journalists have given him so enviable a place among the literary chieftains of the day.

There is one part of the despatch of the General upon which all our contemporaries have offered their comments, and which it is to be hoped will command the attention of the Court of Directors. Sir Charles Napier laments the great paucity of European officers with the Native Regiments, and states that on two or three occasions the sepoy recited under the famous banners of the Belooches when their own officers had fallen; and again rushed on their foes, when other Europeans and officers stepped forward to lead them on. It has been justly remarked that the sepoy in this engagement was not superior in courage to the enemy opposed to them; and that their success was owing partly to their superior discipline, but more especially to the confidence which the presence of their European officers inspired. Had those officers been cut off to such an extent as to leave their men without a head, it is possible that even the military dispositions and the daring courage of Sir Charles might have been unavailing. If he had experienced a repulse, it is difficult to calculate the consequences of the Centurion in the present indomitable state of some of our provinces. Independently of the political result of such a disaster, it would have entailed an expense on Government ten fold greater than that which is saved by leaving their army under officered. The remarks of Sir Charles Napier, written from the field of battle, and with the danger of this miserable policy yet present to his eye, ought to carry weight with the House Authorities. If any thing is wanting to give value to his representations, it may be found in the fact that it comes from a Queen's officer, and is free from the remotest suspicion of interestedness.

DWARAKNATH TAGORE AND THE HURKAR.

Our Contemporary appears, from an article which appeared on Friday last, to be somewhat vexed that we should have been enabled to quote in favour of the general system of Government, the opinion of one so eminently qualified to form a judgment of its character; as Dwarknath Tagore. He says that this eminent individual, never committed a greater mistake than when he said that Government had manifested "a noble solicitude for the welfare and improvement of the millions committed by providence to its charge." Whether the supposed mistake has reference to the interests of the party of which the Hurkars have recently become the organ, or to the interests of truth, we are not informed. That Dwarknath must have given offence to the movement party, which has recently been organized in Calcutta, can be easily understood. But we see no reason why our contemporary should feel such deep regret that the letter was ever written. It may possibly be a little more complimentary than the rigid truth would warrant; but it is infinitely nearer the truth than the statements which have been published in the Hurkars from the pen of the Mockrajee Baboo, and the Old Hindoo.

The Hurkars says that the Tagore family had no objection to Dwarknath's going to England and feasting with the English. They have it seems excluded him from society, and cut him off from all social intercourse because he dared to say that the British Government had been a blessing to India. We think our contemporary has not needed the matter by this new version of their motives. They will gain little in public estimation by being relieved from the charge of bigotry to be adduced with that of tyranny. Their bigotry may be chargeable on their creed; their intolerance is their own sin. There was some show of consistency and even reason in the bigotry. We learn upon enquiry that Haroonkotar Tagore, who took the lead in that proceeding, is esteemed among the Peer Alee, a holy man. He has long cherished the hope of joining one day restored to the society of the orthodox, and nothing was more likely to further his views than such a blaze of orthodox zeal; nothing more calculated to render him worthy of restoration to the full honours of caste, than this excommunication by bell, book, and candle, of the illustrious member of his own family who had ventured, contrary to the rules of the enlightened shastras, to dine with the Queen of England and the King of France. The character of the victim was likely to add value to the sacrifice. Such do not, from such a motive, we can easily comprehend by a simple reference to the superstition which renders it meritorious.

But the explanation which the Hurkars gives of this conduct is incomprehensible. We are told in his columns that the "intelligent inhabitants of the capital of British India are beginning to acquaint themselves with the nature and character of Government, under whose thrall it has been placed, and that no man ought to discourage their laudable disposition." That they should make a beginning by abusing the Government which delivered them from the thralldom of the Mahomedans, may be excused; they are new to the science of Government; and naturally think that its great secret consists in the art of defamation. But that they should begin by turning out of society by far the most eminent native in the country, simply because he has spoken a good word for the Government, is—but we leave Mr. Thompson to characterize it. Is this the liberty which is to mark this new era in the history of native society in Calcutta? Alas, for the seekers after truth, and the lovers of free discussion, the seven days of "any and "congregation" in the metropolis of British India, that they should be so little able to hear the slightest opposition to their views, as to associate such intolerance with such patriotism. Alas! Alas! that the "laudable disposition" to "acquaint themselves with the nature and character of Government," should bear so strong a resemblance to the proceedings of the Inquisition as depicted by La Sagre in the character of Don Raphael. "Non aini, vous oubliez qu'il faut point que votre interrogatoire excusse Samuel Simon; je vous en ai dit les conséquences. Vous ne devez dire que des choses qui soient contre lui, et pas un mot en sa faveur."

But the Herbules has evidently been misinformed by the Tagore. We are happy he has afforded us an opportunity of relieving them from this charge of inconsistency. Whatever may be the feelings of the Old Hindoo and his colleagues towards all who will not join them in railing at Government, we acquit the Tagore family in this instance of any wish to deny to others that right of private judgement which they claim for themselves. The exclusion of Dwarkanath was an act of religious bigotry and not of political intolerance. The Blasphemy, from whose columns we borrowed the information, has given us the most satisfactory evidence on the subject. There does not appear to have been a spark of national feeling in the business. The idea of giving a patriotic turn to the proceeding, and thereby acquiring favour with the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, is evidently an after thought. Hurookomar had better sink by the bigotry, and give up the patriotism.

The grand discovery of the Native writers who have signed in the Herbules, appears to be that the Government of British India is a grinding tyranny. If so, it is the most singular and ineradicable tyranny the world has ever seen. Here we have a meeting of the intelligent and wealthy inhabitants of the metropolis of British India, in the Founders Dispensary, whose families have grown up to wealth and importance under the institutions of this tyrannical Government; whose ancestors, to use the language of a Hindoo of the last generation, never dared to shed a clean garment under the old dynasty lest they should become the objects of plunder. We find them trained up to an acquaintance with the English tongue which enables them to appreciate the eloquence of George Thompson; and instructed in that knowledge which gives dignity to man; and all by this very same tyrannical Government. It is this tyrannical Government which allows them to vilify its character, to impugn its motives, to blacken the character of its officers, and to invoke foreign aid, with perfect impunity; nay, it is this same tyrannical Government which has furnished them with materials for declamation, by the unreserved publication to the world of those documents which exhibit the defects of its administration.

Mr. George Thompson has spoken in terms of censure of the course pursued by the Press in reference to the present agitation. Our contemporaries are well able to answer for themselves. For our part we have no hesitation in saying that we have little confidence in the permanence or utility of the movement, since the power of a movement depends on the character of the movers. We have some little experience in these matters. The minority well manifested towards the British Government is perhaps less violent than that which was exhibited in 1859, when Lord W. Denchford's Station. At that era the whole fabric of Native society was shaken to its foundation, and a degree of hatred was excited against Government, which had not been felt since the day when Rajah Wundthoener was executed. Large funds were raised; a society was organized, consisting of the most wealthy and influential members of society, and an agent dispatched to England to advocate their cause; yet all this zeal evaporated in two or three years; and the Dhurra Sabha died, where the present agitators are said to have begun, by persecuting those who differed from it. We cite this example not because there is any analogy between the object of that great movement and the present, but to show how little past experience will allow us to calculate on the permanence of any such feelings of exuberant zeal. The same burning excitement has in every instance that we know of been succeeded by the same frigid apathy. Nay, there does there appear any thing in the object now set before the young men calculated to sustain their ardor. It has been observed, and not without justice, that if as a conquered country India has few rights, it has fewer wrongs. The prime actors in this movement have really little to complain of in their own case except that the Civil Service is not abolished, to make room for themselves. Solicitude for the welfare of others—for any general improvement in the condition of the people is in this country too transient a feeling to afford a solid foundation for a permanent edifice of patriotism. The chances are therefore to one that on Mr. George Thompson's departure, this movement, which is confined to the section of educated Hindoos in Calcutta, and is supported neither by the Mahomedan nor the European population, nor by the country at large,—will subside; and that no trace of it will remain but in the records of the Press.

Its utility is very questionable. We of course allude only to the written and spoken speeches which have been reported in the Herbules, and they appear to us more likely to enrage than to promote the cause of Indian emendation, by associating it with the most virulent and unjustifiable abuse of our rulers. We have seldom been struck with greater surprise than to find the Herbules admitting into its columns, without rebuke, a letter in which the Civil Service, than which a more honorable body of men does not exist, is charged with having habitually fostered native corruption from the most nefarious personal motives. It is not from such attacks or from such men as the Old Hindoo and his associates that India can ever look for any benefit. A movement like this, based on misrepresentation, can only serve to disgust all men of honorable and benevolent feelings, and cause them to rally round a government so unjustly assailed, which has done much and is doing still more for the welfare of India, and which in the short space of three months has abolished lotteries, and signed the death warrant of slavery. There is moreover no grievance now the subject matter of agitation, which the Press has not been steadily and calmly endeavoring to remove. The inadequacy of the allowances given to the native officers of Government, the glaring defects of the Police, the necessity of extending education, and of employing native agency to a greater extent in the administration, have been urged on the public authorities, by our contemporaries and by ourselves without interruption. However the conductors of the public Journals may have quarreled among themselves, they have made common cause against public grievances. In many instances their labors have been crowned with signal success, in all they have a hope of ultimate triumph. It is not because we are jealous of any trials in the province of public agitation, which belongs especially to the fourth estate, that we object to the present movement, but because we are satisfied that in proportion as its violence increases so will the cause of improvement be retarded.

After these remarks had been written we received the Herbules of Tuesday last, in which Baboo Opendar Mohan Tagore has come forward to deny that the expulsion of Dwarkanath from society arose from the praise he bestowed on Government. Our contemporary has quoted a letter with which Hurookomar Tagore intended to honour us, but did not send, in which he affirms that the excommunication arose from the purest patriotism, and not from bigotry. Any man who knows any thing of the feelings of Native society, and more especially of the position of the Tagores, will feel no hesitation in giving a preference to the statement of Opendar Mohan over that of Hurookomar.

THE SONNATH GATES ARE AT BAY.—The hot winds have set in, and the season is too far advanced for their further advance; they are therefore deposited in the Fort at Agra. The season has been broken up. Major Leach is put on the duty of catching Thugs, and the reports have been sent to their respective Regiments. It is scarcely to be supposed that when the cold weather comes round, the Major and his escort will be re-assembled to commence the journey afresh to Sonnath; the procession may therefore be considered as brought to a close. The next journey of the Gates will be to the Asiatic Society's Museum in Calcutta, if Lord Ellenborough's successor should not rather feel disposed to bestow them on the British Museum. Whatever may be their future destination, it is matter of some gratitude that they are not to be paraded through the country to our shame and confusion. What may be his Lordship's motive for thus consigning them to oblivion, after having issued so flaming a Proclamation, and dispersed copies of it to all the chiefs, big and little, in India, is coloured paper, with the impression of the great vice-regal seal attached to them, it is of little consequence to surmise. Lord Ellenborough may have thought that public attention had been sufficiently aroused, to convince the most incredulous Natives that we have actually humbled the Afghans and recovered our honour; or the impulse which dictated the measure may have died away; or his Lordship may have become wiser and may not be ashamed precisely to acknowledge it; or he may have resolved, from his great regard to the Court of Directors, to anticipate their wishes. It is sufficient to us to know that the affair is ended, and that just at the time when the political opponents whom his Lordship has provoked by his attacks on Lord Auckland's administration, are bringing the Gates into Parliament, and during Sir Robert Peel to justify this measure, the Gates themselves have been left to rot in the Dewanny Am at Agra.

RAIL ROADS.—Several years back, before the Afghans war had drawn off the attention of Government from internal improvements and absorbed the funds which might have been devoted to them, the establishment of a system of communication between the Western Provinces, and the port of Calcutta, was brought under consideration. The opening of a canal between Rajmahal and the capital was then thought the most feasible scheme, and the plan of a rail road was strenuously advocated was considered visionary. The canal is apparently laid on the shelf, and attention has again been paid to the feasibility and propriety of devoting a portion of the revenues of this country to the construction of a rail road, which shall extend, not to Rajmahal only, but on to Benares and even to Delhi. The Englishman and his correspondent Ferraro, have recently discussed the subject with much ardor and ability; and we gladly took advantage of the interest which it has excited to lay before our readers, a plan for a rail road which was recently submitted to the Court of Directors, by a young and zealous officer in their service on this establishment, whose talents were so highly appreciated by Col. Pauley, that when on a recent occasion the Senate of Hambro applied to him for an Engineer to blow up a vessel which obstructed the navigation of the Elbe, the author of this plan was selected for that employment. Just at that time however the news of our disasters in Afghanistan, reached England, and every officer on furlough was hurried out to India, to prevent the sack of Calcutta by Akbar Khan and his mountaineers. He was thus deprived of the opportunity of distinguishing himself.

We publish the sketch, to keep alive the present discussion. The circuitous line of route which he has chosen is we think open to objections, as the object is all rail roads is as far as possible to choose the shortest distance between two points. The facilities which this detour may afford for transporting the produce of particular districts, will, we fear, offer but a small compensation for the extra expense which must be incurred. Be that as it may, our object will be gained if the publication of this plan and estimate, should attract attention, and serve in any degree to advance the most important scheme which has yet been devised for the improvement of the country.

SLAVERY IN INDIA.—At the beginning of this year, the Government of India promulgated the draft of an Act which will terminate the legal bondage of every slave throughout the country, and give every man now held in slavery a right to claim his freedom by an appeal to the Courts of law. This Act was followed up immediately after by another which extinguished the status of slavery through the settlements in the Straits. We have now the pleasure of learning that the slaves on the Island of Ceylon, a Crown colony, have been restored to freedom, as the following extract will show:—

"We give prominence to the following extract from the letter of a correspondent in the Northern Province:—Some months ago a Circular letter from the London Anti-Slavery Society, containing queries on Slavery in India was put into my hands. I collected a mass of curious information which may hereafter, if this permit, be rendered available towards a history of a system which too long existed in Ceylon, but which I hope and believe is now for ever numbered with the departed. I delayed replying to the circular until after the 1st of January, when the effect of the late ordinance would be seen. The trouble has been such as must give pleasure to every friend of freedom. The sum of the 31st December 1842 set on about 4000 men, women, and children in this district (Waddemorey) bearing the name of slaves. Not a single slave has been registered in this year on the best authority that such also has been the result in the following Northern Districts: Jaffna; Malagasy; the Islands Tenasserim and Peninsular."

"In addition to this I am enabled on the authority of a respectable correspondent of Trincomalee to say, that before the passing of the late ordinance slavery had no longer any existence in that district."

"The number of slaves in Ceylon was recently set down at 30,000, the vast majority of whom belonged to the Northern districts. Being the effect of the ordinance here I think I may safely assure you that the same result has followed in every district of the island, and that slavery no longer pollutes our soil. If in any part it is otherwise, I should feel much obliged to any correspondent who through the medium of your columns will inform me of the fact."—Ceylon Observer.

When the Acts which are now in embryo have become mature, and are incorporated with the laws of India, we shall have the satisfaction of seeing slavery extinguished throughout the English dominions in the East; and it may then be said with truth that in whatever portion of the globe the British flag waves, it waves over freemen. This is a proud distinction for a nation which was till lately one of the greatest abettors of slavery. It is true, that in this country the bondage of the slave except in some districts, was so extremely mild as scarcely to deserve the name of slavery, and that the abolition will make little perceptible difference in the condition of the country. Still it was an object worthy the attention of a great Government to remove every obstacle to the enjoyment of complete freedom by its subjects. It is gratifying likewise to the benevolent mind, as a proof that liberal principles have taken root in our Indian administration, and that we may look with confidence for other measures of improvement.

One of our contemporaries appears to think that the Act will be inoperative unless severe penalties are inflicted on those who may continue to hold their fellow creatures in slavery in defiance of its prohibitions. There can be little doubt that such an enactment will be requisite, before the benevolent views in which the legislation originated, are fully realised. But we must not attempt too much at first. Judging from the recorded opinion of the members of Government, and of the Law Commission, we should be inclined to say that a great point has been unexpectedly gained by thus destroying the legal claim of every master throughout India on the services and the earnings of his slave. The present Act has evidently been carried with some little difficulty; and it is far from improbable that if an attempt had been made to render its provisions more stringent in the first instance, the design itself might have miscarried. There has apparently been a laudable effort to avoid any direct and palpable opposition to the prejudices of those who were unable to make up their minds to the instant extinction of all slavery. Such obstacles, from which the best constructed administration is not free, must be taken into account in judging of the provisions of the proposed Act. In England it was not till the slave trade had been abolished twenty-six years, that society was prepared for the abolition of slavery itself. The disappearance of a whole generation with its prejudices and predilections, was requisite to complete the great act of freedom. Some time may therefore be reasonably allowed in this country to elapse between this announcement of personal freedom, and the enactment of penalties for inflicting it.

A REPORT OF THE CALCUTTA CORRESPONDING COMMITTEE OF THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—We now proceed to review the Missionary exertions made during the past year, under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society at this Presidency. The number of Missions engaged under its direction, is twenty-five; viz. twelve in Bengal, and thirteen in the North West Provinces. Four labourers are engaged in Calcutta, at the Head Quarters of the Mission at Mirzapore. The number of communicants is forty-six; the usual Christian congregation, two hundred; no additions appear to have been made during the year. The Native Christian Institution under the superintendence of Mr. Long, is designed to give an English and oriental education to Hindoos and Mahomedans on Christian principles. It numbers forty youths in the male department. The first class, consisting of seven scholars, have been engaged during the past year in the study of the Scriptures, Milton's Paradise lost, the History of England, the History of India, Lennie's English Grammar, Goldsmith's Geography, Arithmetic, the Latin Grammar, and the Elements of Geometry.—The female department contains thirty-four girls. The Head Secretary, intended to train up Native Catechists, does not flourish. It appears to have had but two students last year; and they have been sent to labour at Kishinpur. It is right to mention however that Mr. Long has under his charge a class of eight Christian boys whom he is training up for Catechists and School Masters.

The Church Missionary Society has also a sphere of labour, like the Incorporated Society, the Independents and the Baptists in the villages to the south of Calcutta, where a spirit of enquiry was excited about eighteen years ago by the labours of the late Mr. Trawin, who may be considered the founder of a Mission which has produced larger results than any other Mission in Bengal. The number of Christians connected with the Church Society in eighteen villages, amounts to three hundred. The number of individuals baptised last year was sixty,—thirty-seven adults and twenty-three children.

Mr. Long reports that he has last year entered upon a new branch of labour; that of preaching to adults in their own vernacular language. We are happy to hear it. We think however he is disposed to attach too much importance to the concentration of Missionary labour in the metropolis; and to the diffusion of Christian truth through the English language. No missionary, says he, can have a more important department of labour than that of superintending an English School. This is not the place for combating a doctrine to which we cannot subscribe; we will only therefore remark, that the other department of labour on which he has lately entered, that of instructing the people, like the apostles, in "the wonderful works of God, in their own tongue wherein they were born," appears to us quite as important as teaching them English.—There is also a Hindoostanee department of labour in Calcutta under the superintendence of Mr. Thompson and Mr. Lindstedt. The attendance at the Chapel in the morning amounts to fifty; the number baptised last year amounted to six, and the communicants to twenty-three. There are also eleven candidates for baptism.

The report of the Institution at Agurpam is rather meagre. We never pass the Refuge on our way to and from Calcutta, with its Gothic towers reflected on the waters of the Hooghly, without being impressed with the inconsistency of human prospects. This institution was erected by the indefatigable exertions of the noble mind of Mrs. Wilson. To its establishment she devoted the whole energy of her character. It is ment of her mind and heart, and of the latest ones; yet it had scarcely been completed, when a change in her religion views deprived her of the privilege of superintending it, and others have not entered into her labours. Their labours are doubtless equally successful, but they have not been equally successful, and the report before us shows how deeply the absence of her animating spirit has been felt.

The Mission at Durban, under the management of Mr. Lincho, has received assistance by the baptism of nine of the older orphan girls and two Europeans, one of whom was formerly a religious devotee. The English School at this station, the only institution of the kind in this wealthy and populous district, contains seventy lads, who are regularly instructed in the truths of Christianity. The indigenous Native Schools have been gradually reduced to five. The system of instruction is deficient, and the range of instruction very limited. Hence they do not stand high in the estimation of Natives, and it is proposed, if it could be improved, to close them. We hope they will be improved.

With so many Missionaries in this country, acquainted in so eminent a degree with the vernacular tongue, and enjoying so much leisure, it would be very strange if a system of vernacular education could not be brought to maturity. This station has two orphan establishments, one for boys in which there are thirty, and the other for girls which contains thirty-eight children.

It is in the district of Kilmangham, however, that the efforts of the Society in the province of Bengal have been most successful. Some years ago a new sect which had recently broken off from the grosser doctrines of idolatry sought Christian instruction, and the Church Missionary Society eagerly embraced the opportunity to plant the gospel, and to build up Christian institutions among them. Five stations in different parts of the district have been the result of this effort. The report before us does not afford any data for judging of the present number of converts, but we find that at four of the five stations, the number of baptisms during the past year was three hundred and sixty-three; of these, as far as we can judge, two hundred may have been children and infants. Christian Boarding Schools have been established at each station, which, though very expensive, are likely to be very useful in training up readers, catechists and school-masters. It is highly desirable that the Mission in this district should turn up its own Native teachers in every department of labour, and not depend on importing them from Calcutta. The Calcutta Native teachers would soon be above their business, and only serve to introduce discontent in the Christian community. That Mission stands in need of many labourers, but they must be men adapted by the simplicity of their habits to the circumstances of the people among whom they are called to travel and labour. The Boarding schools should be converted at the earliest period into seminaries, and the scale of instruction improved, that they will then become useful in the highest degree.

The conduct of too many of the converts has been distressing. When so large a number is admitted at once into the Christian flock, such disappointments are inevitable. Mr. Blumhardt writes, "there is a painful indifference, pervasiveness and insensibility to spiritual objects, observable in most of the people, which renders the work before them a great trial." The native Calcutta at Beharagah writes, that they treated him shamefully, that they spoke to him and said that both the solemnity and he had surprised them of the Baptism they got from the Committee.—"I do not know," says he, "when these men will understand that religion is not a trade." Mr. Lipp says, "while it is to be lamented that the majority of those who some years ago became Christians by name, show little desire for Christian instruction, and still less exhibit by their life a converted heart; yet there are some who appear to be touched by the grace of God, and who may prove in the end, that the work of love and patience has not been in vain among them." These extracts will serve to show that quite as much labour is requisite, to keep alive the spirit of Christianity among those who have been baptized and confirmed, as to bring over fresh converts from heathenism. In such circumstances nothing perhaps could be more disastrous than the employment of teachers who should tell the people, that if they relied for salvation on the sacraments administered by an episcopally ordained minister, they could not go wrong.

At Benares there are two Missionaries besides an English School-master; but the Church Missionaries, like their brethren of the London Society, are still obliged to labour in hope. At Jaunpore, the Rev. Mr. Haines has been labouring for the past twelve months. At Chunar, resident the veteran missionary, Mr. Bowley, superintending a circle of Schools, and itinerating through his own and the neighbouring districts. Gourpore has been the scene of an experiment undertaken by Mr. Wilkinson, the late Missionary, to raise a Christian and agricultural colony on land reclaimed from the jungle. The plan has not succeeded to the extent of his wishes; but there is no cause for despair. The grant consists of 1193 acres, one half of which is under cultivation, but the greater part of the cultivators are Hindus. There is a handsome Church, with its spire rising above the trees, but the number of houses belonging to the Christians does not exceed twenty-five; and they can scarcely be prevailed upon to turn their attention to agriculture, while they can obtain a livelihood by cutting wood and selling it in the market. The Christians moreover show few signs of spiritual life, and the orphan boys are very troublesome, as Mr. Windings says, both there and every where else in India. This experiment however will doubtless succeed in time. The Native Christians will learn to trust more to their own exertions, and to lean less on others; the Hindus on the grant, will gradually come over to Christianity, through the predominance of Christian influence, and the labours of Christian teachers among them. At any rate, their children may be weaned from idolatry by early and evangelical tuition; and a few years of perseverance will probably make the prospects of this station as bright as they now appear gloomy.

This review has extended to such length, that we have only room to remark that the station of Agra enjoys the labours of four Missionaries. During the past year, one native has been received into the Church by baptism; and we regret to learn that ten vernacular Schools in which three hundred children received instruction have been relinquished through the failure of local funds.

The sum expended in the Mission throughout this Presidency during the year, amounted to Rs. 116,960; of which Rs. 100,810 were contributed by the Parent Society, and 15,150 Rs. raised in the country.

New Prisoners.—Within the last week we have received copies of two new Journals from the sister Presidencies. The Record, a bi-weekly journal has been started at Madras, at the very moderate charge of 10 Rupees a year; a sum we fear far too low to meet the mechanical expense of the paper and to admit of the engagement of superior talent for the Editorial department. We wish our new labourer every success.

A second attempt has been made to establish a daily paper at Bombay, but the specimens we have seen of the Journal, which has been named the British Indian Gentleman's Gazette and Bombay Daily Newspaper do not augur bright prospects. In a place where the indefatigable Times and the witty Courier, carry the day, a competitor being very strong claims to public favour before he can obtain a footing. Yet the British Indian Gentleman's Gazette and Bombay Daily Newspaper calculates upon a subscription list as long as the tail of the new Comet. Nothing short of five thousand subscribers will satisfy his ambition. If he should succeed in these hopes, Government have reason to bless him, for the postage on his paper will amount to the sum of Two lakhs and twenty-five thousand Rupees a year. We see our Bombay contemporaries have been making themselves merry at the expense of the new comer; but a little professional jealousy must not discourage the Editor. He will not attain the five thousand subscribers, but he may improve his editorials, and thus silence the voice of slander.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16.

—The last letters from Hyderabad state, that more than a crore of Rupees of prize money has been discovered, and that Capt. Basset had been appointed prize agent. The office would have been given to Captain Tuckey, but for his refusal. The case of this gallant officer is exceedingly unfortunate. He was turned out of his place in the Military Auditor General's office, and removed to his regiment. On arriving at Sukkur in India, he proceeded with his troop towards Hyderabad, was engaged in that well-fought field, severely wounded, and thus through the effects of his own gallantry is deprived of the valuable office which would otherwise have fallen to him.

—The Delhi Gazette states, that two Harkas had arrived at Lahore from Cabul with despatches from Akbar Khan, in which he said that he was about to send 15,000 Cavalry with 7,000 Infantry to Peshawar to escort his father back. The report is rather more numerous than General Aulic could wish, and there is some reason to think that if the troops were once permitted to visit Peshawar, they would be in no hurry to quit it. The severe writer of Peshawar had written to Lahore to say that there was no doubt of Akbar Khan's intention to visit Peshawar; and that he would then proceed on to Mooltan.

—Letters from Bombay of the 8th instant state, that the Council sat on Sunday the 7th till four o'clock; that troops were to be sent off immediately to Cutch, and that there was little doubt of Scinde being annexed to the Bombay Presidency. Three steamers had left Bombay during the week with 800 additional troops for Scinde. Major Outram, it is said, will not be allowed to proceed to Europe. It was rumored that the communication between Hyderabad and Karachi had been cut off, and that another attack was meditated by General Napier.

FRIDAY, MARCH 17.

—The Native ground in Calcutta appears to have entered in good earnest upon the question of taking the management of municipal matters into their own hands. It is singular, that two years should have been suffered to elapse since the Act was passed without any effort whatever, and that the present effort should be the result of a Sapper from Government House. But the time has now, it seems, arrived when the offer of Government will be accepted. A Sub-Committee of Householders was held yesterday, when preliminary arrangements were made. It was suggested that at Rs. a quarter, should be the lowest qualification, for a vote. These 10 Rs. a month rent payers are very numerous, and the constituency must necessarily be large. An application, it is said, will be made to Government for the appropriation of the Liquor tax and the Canal returns to municipal purposes.

—Capt. P. Nicholson, lately in charge of the Deccan, arrived at Ferozepore from Ludhiana on the 25th February.

—Colonel Wallace, with the detachment of Bengal troops, which was recently sent back from Sialkot, and which would have proved so invaluable an auxiliary in the present emergency, arrived at Ferozepore on the 28th February.

—Letters from Rangoon, the 17th of February, state that the casting of the great ball which had been so long talked of, was to take place on the next day, and that several hundred artificers had been assembled from various quarters to assist on the occasion.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10.

—The Star states, that one of the out-posts in the Bundelkand or Sangor districts, had been attacked by the insurgents. They were successfully repulsed.

—Letters from Bombay received at the Star office state, that the most active preparations were making to send reinforcements to Scinde and Cutch. On our side the 6th Native Infantry is to proceed from Ferozepore, and the 56th from Delhi, we suppose down the Sutledge. Such active military preparations, such hot haste in sending forward reinforcements, is a strange comment on the announcement that there was "tranquillity in Dundelkand, and peace in India."

—At the Annual Meeting of the Parental Academy on Thursday evening, upwards of two hundred ladies and gentlemen assembled to hear the report read and George Thompson speak. Dr. Corry is moving the first resolution, passed a high religious on the Institution, might have been dispensed with. Mr. George Thompson moved the Second Resolution, but his speech is not fully reported. We are happy to learn that the Institution has got over the difficulties which lately threatened its existence, and is now in a flourishing condition. From Mr. Byrne's vote of thanks we surmise that it has been liberally secured by the donations of friends.

—Sir Hugh Gough has arrived at the Madras Presidency and been received with the most enthusiastic greeting.

—The Englishman states on the strength of a letter from Aracan, that a severe volcanic eruption has manifested itself in that province. The occurrence of this eruption, according to our contemporary, has probably saved us from another earthquake. Whose with burning mountains at our door, and comets above our heads, the year will not lack memorials.

—The Bombay papers just received, state that a detachment of fifty sepoys at Vikkur in Lower Scinde, had been attacked and cut up by the enemy. The spirit of opposition will of course run like wildfire through the country and put in jeopardy every European, and every native connected with us.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20.

—The intelligence from Scinde becomes daily more interesting. Peace has disappeared, and we are again called to chronicle, week by week, the progress of Military enterprises. The accounts received this day are deep, and in some respects painfully interesting. The Englishman's correspondent at Bombay, in his letter of the 10th instants, that the Regiment at Sukkur being isolated is considered in great danger; and that many officers are missing. The Belooches have been driving away all the cattle, with the view of starving out the British. General Napier has entrenched himself at Hyderabad; but is sadly in want of officers. The Belooches army, though defeated, is not annihilated; and it is said to menace the province of Cutch. The Bombay Government is all activity. Council upon Council is held and itsittings are prolonged to the night.

All available troops are ordered off to reinforce Sir Charles Napier. Detachments have been sent to Mandavio in Cutch. Major Outram is refused permission to return to England. Of what inestimable service at this juncture would have been H. M. 40th, which has been so prematurely shipped to England, and the Bengal column under Brigadier Wallace, which has returned to Bengal. But the Belooches are foolish in reasoning from our position in Afghanistan to our position in Scinde. There is no Helen and Khyber, but a broad river, and before they can look about them, British troops will be every where prepared to keep down opposition. We have conquered China by Steam; and by Steam shall we keep Scinde.

—The treasure found at Hyderabad is in the last accounts stated at two crores of Rupees. A considerable portion of this sum will doubtless be given as prize money; but there will be enough left to cover the expenses of the war. A war that pays itself is generally popular in England.

The Times Herald of yesterday has an article on the Civil Service somewhat oddly constructed. The first sentence of the first paragraph says in allusion to them, that "It is not at all surprising that the members of a profession, favoured by the Governor General, should be ready to praise his administration." The first sentence of the second paragraph runs thus. "It is said that Lord Ellenborough dislikes the Civil Service, and would if he had the power, throw open the employments now monopolized by that favoured class to public competition." Are the two paragraphs from the same pen?

—Mr. Fowell, an Assistant in the Board of Revenue, has just put an end to himself in a fit of mental aberration. He conceived himself the victim of a conspiracy.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21.

—Neither the Hindustan steamer nor the Express were in last evening. Last year the Mail arrived on the 23d of March; but if it is delayed to that date, it seems more than probable that the Steamer will bring us the first intelligence.

—The Sumnath Gates arrived at Agra on the 10th instant, and Sir W. Nott two days after.

—A very extraordinary correspondence has just appeared in the papers of the Presidency between Mr. O'Hanlon, a Justice of the Peace, and Mr. Gordon, the Secretary of the Union Bank, marked private, but written in an official style. The Justice of the Peace charges Mr. Gordon with having been criminally wasteful of our property: that is of the Proprietors of the Union Bank; and he states his own loss at 10,000 Rs. He then proceeds to state that he intended at one time to attend a meeting of the Bank and rip open Mr. Gordon's past life, and invite him to retire, but he had not time for it; for so he says, it is a terrible thing to impeach a man with whom one has been on terms of intimacy. But it means he had nerves for another act, which was to demand of Mr. Gordon to make good the sum of Four thousand odd hundred Rupees which his son lost two years ago by the failure of Mackintosh and Co. The letter says very categorically, "Will you pay, or shall he proceed?" Mr. Gordon in his reply to this, we had almost said, fulsome, letter, enters very unnecessarily into the defence of his own conduct, and demands to have on what ground the claim is made. The particulars are given, but Mr. Gordon's final answer does not appear, though it is very easy to guess his nature. Would it not be as well for the Deputy Governor to extend to the Police Magistrates the same unexceptionable Pension rules, by which servants when suspected for further employment by "bodily or mental infirmity," are allowed to retire on a pension?

—The Harbours of yesterday contained an account of a brutal outrage committed by a body of natives on Mr. Oldfield the Opium Agent at Patna.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22.

—No Hindostan—No Express up to last night and though the comet looks brighter, now the moon has ceased to eclipse it, yet up to the time of our going to press there has been no indication. The latest news of Scinde is no better than that given in the Harbours of this morning. It extends to the 1st. General Napier had no intention of marching into the desert to Unweatere where it was said that the Belooches had assembled in great numbers. He was still encamped at Hyderabad, where he was so strongly posted as to be able to resist every attack. The whole country is in a blas; but reinforcements were pouring in from Bombay with unexampled rapidity. The natives on either bank of the river had removed the wood collected for the Steamers and it was with much difficulty they moved up and down. Captain Denny of the 21st N. I. who had fallen into the hands of the Belooches, had been barbarously murdered.

—The Harbours states that a flaming proclamation relative to the annexation of Scinde to the British dominions is likely to appear in this evening's Calcutta Herald; that Scinde will be formed into a new Presidency with Sir Charles Napier as the head of it.

—The Delhi Gazette just arrived, contains news from Hyderabad to the 3d and from Sukkur to the 5th, up to which date no attack had been made on our posts.

Lord Ellenborough has erected Scinde into a province of the British empire, and appointed His Excellency Sir Charles Napier, Governor. We subject the first acts of sovereignty.

up the desperate bank of the Fohelike. Major Wyllie, Captain Tucker and Curvey, Lieutenants Harding and Phillips, were all wounded while gallantly sustaining the men to sustain the shock of numbers. And now, my Lord, I have to say that British officers could not show greater gallantry in leading their men into action than did Lieutenants Green's and Company's officers on this day, and the French well maintained their reputation.

From the kinds of departments and regiments I have received every assistance throughout the whole campaign and in the battle.

The gallant charge of the Bengal Cavalry was introduced by Lieutenant-Colonel Pettie, second in command, a Major Story, now was the Scinde horse under Captain Colby. To this able soldier and his regiment I am indebted for the most active services, long previous to, during the combat. He was the enemy's camp, from which he drove a body of three or four thousand cavalry.

Major Lloyd powerfully worked his artillery, ably aided by Captains Whittle and Hutt. The destruction caused by their guns is said to have been immense.

Major Waddington of the Engineers, has given me great assistance throughout the campaign, and in the action he has his aid in carrying orders.

Nor is the country less indebted to Major Reid for gallantry at the head of the 15th N. I. The grenadiers under Major Cilbert, owing to a misconception of orders

Major Poulos of the 2nd, and Captain Jackson of the 30th who succeeded to the command of those regiments, prove themselves worthy of their dangerous posts. In the medical and commissariat departments both activity and zeal have been shown by Dr. Dalrymple and Captain Blenkinsop.

Major Wylie, Assistant Adjutant General, was wounded while leading up the bank, and I have thereby lost, for a time, his valuable assistance, no man has been more active than he in the last few days.

at various times.

Finally, I trust for receiving indulgence from one so well known how difficult my position has been for the last few months up to the present moment, and how I have labored and how much I have risked to avert the necessity to arrest the President.

Forced upon me by the duplicity of the Americans, that I must say that until the attack upon the President neither Major Outran nor myself, believed they were obliged to fight, and against which duplicity, I never ceased to warn them. My conscience acquits me of the blame which has been shed. The Transvaal are deceitful and treacherous. The wrongs they have done to the Boers, reveal that, if allowed to go on, and broader wrongs

I perceive that I have omitted to mention three other well worthy of being named. To Captain Tait, of the Porpoise, I entrusted the command of the Porpoise in the battle, and I have no doubt that the strenuous and inspiring attitude of the detachment under his command, was greatly aided by the presence of the Porpoise in the battle. I am sure your Lordship no post will be more grateful to me for mentioning the names of these three men. I have no doubt that the presence of the Porpoise in the battle, was greatly aided by the presence of the Porpoise in the battle. I am sure your Lordship no post will be more grateful to me for mentioning the names of these three men.

I hope your Lordship will pardon me for saying that I want of European officers in the native regiments at this period, endangered the success of the action. The is a brave and valiant soldier, but like all soldiers he is not a leader. I had on this day, and so he looks like a European officer, if he mislead him, and the British officers—three times I saw them retreat, evidently misled them they, and when another appeared and misled them they at once followed him bodily. This, Lord, accounts for the great number of European officers killed and wounded in proportion to the whole. I am sure that in observing a danger in the formation of the company of officers, which might have been so serious, should not be forced, without necessity, to be so serious.

19. The cost of the construction of the Railway having been estimated at above 44,000 rupees a mile, or allowing for contingencies, 50,000 a mile, to give a return of 1 per cent, on the capital expended would require a sufficient number of passengers and quantity of goods to yield a profit equal to 2500 rupees a mile; then saying that the charge of one penny a mile a ton or passenger would yield 40 per cent. as shown in para. 18. To ensure payment of capital, after the payment of current expenses, it would require such a return of 2000 rupees for passengers as there are 2-3 or 40 per cent. of a penny, in 2500 rupees, which will be taking the rupee at 2s. or 24 pence 3500 x 24 = 54,000.

20. In the Report on the Rajmahal canal by Major General Macleod and Major Forbes, dated 15th February 1861, it is stated in paragraph 47 "that the receipts of toll for one year on the Nidduh River at the rate of one rupee, per 100 mauts amounted to 180,000 rupees, and this whilst two small descriptions of boats and the third was only navigable for the smaller description of cargo boats" thus showing that (the toll being equal to 25 mauts) 180,000 x 100 = 25 = 7,200,714 tons passed along a portion of the proposed line, and this was only a part of the traffic on the Ganges as none but small boats could pass through these Rivers.

21. In the Parliamentary paper entitled "Report on India produced, and to be printed on the 21st July 1861," the following are the quantities of the principal articles exported from Calcutta annually, viz.

Cotton,	3,000,000 Mauts.
Grain,	20,000,000 "
Indigo,	100,000 "
Sugar,	6,000,000 "
Saltpetre,	5,000,000 "
Opium,	200,000 "
Silk,	14,000 "
Wool and Cotton pieces	300,000 "
	100,000 "

4,174,000 mauts which at 25 mauts a ton will equal 104,350 tons. Again there are the imports and exports of which I have at present no means of making a correct estimate. 51. The quantity of salt sold in Calcutta averages 4,000,000 mauts annually, and this, as we find ascribed by the House of Commons to be printed on the 2nd August 1859," and a considerable portion of this proceeds up the country and would pay the expenses of the railway, and is very liable to damage from leakage in water carriage.

52. The number of travellers I have no means of estimating beyond the Europeans, who form such a small portion of the community; and therefore will not attempt to show what the return would be from this source without further information on the subject.

53. I trust that in the above I have shown the feasibility of constructing a railway in India with the probability of its annually repaying the expense of construction, and should the Honourable Court think fit to direct further enquiry to be made in India on the subject, and a survey of the country to be undertaken to ascertain the best course for such a communication as well as to prepare estimates of the cost, I would beg to offer my services for the duty, one they do not require at the Military Hill on my return to India, and would be happy at once to submit an estimate of probable expense of such a survey and enquiry.

COLONEL STODDARD AND CAPT. CONNELLY.

The sad fate of Colonel Stoddard and Capt. Connelly has been made the theme of several paragraphs in the papers lately, and we are very much obliged to a friend (thely a Captive himself) for the following particulars relating to the misfortune. Government either at home or abroad have no reason to prize in constant their conduct in this sad affair. Even whilst we write and when a portion of the following relation is in type, a glances upon the daily columns of the Calcutta papers will show that their Generals at Bakhra stating both parties to be alive, though still in confinement, no date is however given to the letter and on the 10th inst. we are informed with the property of the parties that would render it the interest of the others to persuade the relatives of the unfortunate that they are still alive, we find that the latter to be a correct one, but we will give our correspondent's communication.

"As I have observed no mention in your paper of the late misadventure lately involved in an official letter, by the Government, from Sir John Peel, to the Governor-General, on the subject of the capture of the writer's son. At that time he was Charles Stoddard and Arthur Connelly, the following brief details may not be unacceptable to your readers. After a prolonged confinement in a pestilence danger, he had no serious impairment of his health as to render their speedy dismission necessary, it seems they were led out for exercise before the assembly of Bakhra. They were then offered their lives on condition of embracing the Mahomedan faith. This they assiduously refused to do, and were immediately beheaded, before the assembly of Bakhra, and their bodies were thrown to the dogs. Of the many valuable lives which have fallen a sacrifice to our ill-advvised Afghan policy, I know of none that may be more truly characterized as a public loss.

Lieutenant Colonel Charles Stoddard distinguished himself at the very onset of life by his extraordinary attainments as a scholar, where he carried off the first prizes in every department of knowledge and science smelt at that institution, and, as the highest reward the Government could bestow, he was honoured with a commission in the Royal Staff corps. After serving with considerable distinction in various parts of the globe, he was selected to accompany Colonel Chesney's expedition to the Kafiristan, the results of which are already well known. Shortly after his return to England, he was attached to the suite of the British Ambassador about to sail for Persia, as Secretary of Legation. In Persia by his mental acquirements, his nobility of soul, his generous chivalry, aided by his commanding stature and soldierly bearing, he speedily won the esteem and regard of the King and people, and, with a view of placing him in a position to do good, he was sent to the Persian language the lives of many of the most eminent public characters in ancient and modern times. On the invasion of Afghanistan by our army he was dispatched by Sir John Neill on a mission to the Court of Bakhra, the principal object of which was to negotiate for the liberation of any Russian slaves that might be then lingering out a wretched existence.

This was indeed an employment well suited to one of his lamented enthusiasm of character, and, in the midst of all personal risks, he faithfully pleaded the cause of human suffering in the very presence of the tyrannical despot of the modern East. The result of his mission was himself and useless to the victims whose cause he advocated. All attempts at reasoning, apart from any appeal to self interest, was utterly thrown away upon a monster who had no other aim than to level with the brute by habits of debauchery too gross and disgusting to be named to Christian ears. Many days had not passed before poor Stoddard's independent bearing having wounded the barbarian's pride, he was suddenly seized and consigned to a dark disgusting den, filled with vermin, filth and noxious vapours, where bodies suffering grievous bodily torments he was exposed to every species of insult and disgrace from the degraded populace. It may not be generally known that Mohamed Uli Khan was for many days a tenant of the same prison with him, but managed to effect his escape. He always spoke of Stoddard in terms of high admiration, and I really believe felt him a genuine attachment.

As length, a grave having been dug, Stoddard was placed within it and told that his choice lay between immediately embracing the Mahomedan faith, or pronouncing the Kalima-i-Sikander, or Mahomedan creed, adopting therefor the laws of Islam for those of Christ. Weakened by long fasting and the sufferings he had undergone, and naturally shrinking from so horrible an alternative as that placed before him, let not us, his fellow Christians, who have never ourselves called upon to encounter such a trial, be too ready to condemn our gallant countryman if, for once, the love of life prevailed, and his strong mind gave way in circumstances where perhaps few would have been found to resist for a moment. His life was spared, and, having been clothed in a dress of honour, he was at once advanced by the Sultan to the rank of lieutenant. His life was spared, and, having been clothed in a dress of honour, he was at once advanced by the Sultan to the rank of lieutenant. His life was spared, and, having been clothed in a dress of honour, he was at once advanced by the Sultan to the rank of lieutenant.

On my arrival at Cabul in April 1861, I made a correspondence with this friend of my early days, and received from him a reply, which, for depth of feeling, richness of sentiment, and lucidity of style was well worthy of the noble character of the writer's mind. At that time he was living in tolerable comfort, being in high favour with the king, who had even consented to his leaving the country. Of this he assured me it was his intention to avail himself, and that he intended to delay his departure for a single day, being to forward the views of the British Government by acquiring valuable information, and rendering the influence of our arms. He had then never to be recalled. On the news of the Cabul insurrection, and the successes of the Afghan rebels against the king, he was informed that our envoys prevailed over every other feeling, and poor Stoddard was a second time consigned to a miserable dungeon.

Let me now turn to Arthur Connelly. This officer's name has already become famous throughout the civilized world from his most interesting personal narrative of an overland journey to India via Russia, Persia, and Afghanistan. The same spirit of enterprise which he then exhibited in so favourable a light, animated and influenced him to the last. The situation of Political Assistant to his illustrious relative, Sir Wm. Macnaghten, opened a fine field for his ambition, which, tempered as it was by a generous spirit of universal benevolence, continually prompted him to derive advantage for the moral amelioration of Turkestan into which country he was sent on a mission, and whence he, from time to time, forwarded to Government most valuable and interesting information, illustrative of the manners, laws, and customs of the people, which, it is to be hoped, will be long laid before the public.

He was distinguished by an investigation in the country of Kokan when he received a flattering invitation from the king of Bokhara to visit his capital, to be present at a festival. Ignorant of the unfavorable result of his mission, he was seized and thrust into the diabolical cell, of which poor Stoddard was a fellow occupant. Well was it for Arthur Connelly that he had long accustomed his mind to lean his support on the never-failing prop of Christian faith in every exigency. Well was it for Stoddard, that in the hour of his greatest trial, a friend should, in so unlooked for a manner, have been brought to his aid, and his drooping spirit, and animate him afresh for the fearful conflict between human frailty and Christian duty. That these two heroes in adversity, were a mutual support and encouragement, and the well-known instances of extraordinary suffering, was apparent from the two letters forwarded at Cabul in the summer of 1861, by Sir John Connelly. In a host of the house of Nawab Zeman Khan, from his brother Arthur, which the latter had prevailed on one of his keepers to forward. In the first letter he mentioned that Stoddard and himself had been nearly eight days without change of raiment, in the second and deadly atmosphere of a small dark den that teemed with vermin. In his second and last letter they had been one hundred and twenty days in a similar state. Stoddard, the noble and manly Stoddard, was described as wasted to a skeleton, his body almost naked and covered with sores, into which he was perpetually digging his long overgrown nails for relief against the noxious vermin that were literally gnawing his raw sides. He was so weak that he could scarcely move, having committed their souls to God in the full expectation, that a very short time would probably terminate their sufferings. Shortly after General Pakenham's arrival at Cabul, Stoddard wrote a letter to Sir John Connelly, in which he wrote that he felt that Connelly had died a natural death; but this is now contradicted by the recent account from Sir John Connelly, who writes that Stoddard would appear that a more honourable fate was reserved for these two intrepid sons of Britain, even that of sealing their testimony to the Christian faith in their last moments. How long they lived with their own blood. As Christians we have grounds for thankfulness that the honour of our religion has been thus upheld by two such worthy warriors; but, England, how long will it be that a petty barbarian of Central Asia should thus presume to set against our power—that he should triumph unavailingly?—Edith Gentry, March 5.

APRIL OVERLAND MAIL.

NOTICE is hereby given, that the latest safe date for the transmission of Letters from Calcutta, which may be intended for despatch from Bombay, by the May Steamer, will be Wednesday, the 19th proximo.

W. L. MOORE,

GENERAL POST OFFICE, } Deputy Post Master.
The 24th March, 1843. }

THE FEBRUARY MAIL reached Calcutta on Wednesday last by the Hindustan Steamer. It is not barren like some of its late predecessors. The meeting of Parliament always imparts animation to society, and gives interest to our home intelligence. Parliament was opened on the 2d of February; and the speech from the throne, which was read by Commissioners, was worded with such caution as to secure an address without a division. The Opposition members have mustered strong, but we are as yet unable to estimate its relative strength; though there is every reason to believe that the Ministerial majority will be numerically as great as in the last Parliament, if not greater. Notwithstanding the change of opinion on the subject of the corn laws in the minds of some Conservatives, Sir Robert Peel states that he has no intention to propose in them, and that he has no intention to relinquish his sliding and slippery scale. The Anti-corn law agitation, was in the mean while progressing without any apparent abatement. Mr. Cobden and Col. Thompson had proceeded on a mission to Scotland, and created a considerable sensation. The former gentleman had been honoured with the freedom of the city of Edinburgh. The meetings which had been held in various parts of that country appear to have created a powerful effect. If any relaxation of the laws is obtained, it will manifestly be the result of the pressure from without; of that opposition to the bread tax, which has been so ably organized by the bold and persevering spirits at the head of the movement.

The Afghan campaign had become the subject of Parliamentary discussion, and appears likely to attract much attention, and give rise to much acrimonious debate during the Session. The desolation which our troops spread around them as they advanced and retired had been alluded to with much indignation, both by Lord John Russell and Lord Brougham; and it is probable that the vote of thanks which the Ministry intended to move to Lord Ellenborough and the troops, would be selected as the occasion for a renewed attack on the Governor General. Some of the Ministerial organs of the Press, endeavour to excuse these excesses by attributing them to the uncontrollable feelings of the troops. But they have read the dispatches to little purpose if they have not discovered that the vengeance inflicted on the country was evidently the result of orders from the highest authority. The devastation is duly reported by the commanding officers to the Governor General in their despatches, in language which leaves no room to doubt that they acted strictly in conformity to the instructions they had received, and that for the havoc they created they looked for praise, and not censure. The Governor General himself, in his Proclamation alludes with a feeling of exultation to the ruin of Ghuzni, which offered us no resistance, and was demolished after the most scientific fashion.

In the debate on the address in the House of Lords, the Duke of Wellington threw the mantle of his own high character and reputation over Lord Ellenborough. When his Lordship originally took charge of the Government of India, he declared that the approbation of the appointment by the Duke was the circumstance which gave him the highest satisfaction. The Duke has well requited this feeling of veneration. His Grace said—

"I have seen something of Governor Generals of India, and I know a little of military affairs, and of military difficulties, and I must say this—that I stand here prepared on any day to justify every order or movement, either one way or the other, the Governor General of India has given from the moment at which he took upon himself the administration of India."

"I am ready to do that whenever the noble lord chooses to make any charge against the Governor General. Let him come forward and make his charges when he pleases, I shall be ready to reply to them. My Lords, I say that the Governor General, as soon as he attained to his position, did as much as he was enabled to do, according to the state of preparation which he found in India at the moment. He could do no more than he did; every order he gave, whether to halt or to march, was an order absolutely necessary for the safety of the troops at the moment; not occasioned by any omission or act of his, but by acts done or omitted to be done by his rivals. I am bound to say this in defence of an absent servant of the Crown, who, I firmly believe, has done his duty by the public."

There is a boldness in this speech, which in any other individual but the Duke would be deemed rashness; and we cannot but think it is more likely to shake public confidence in the Duke's judgment, than materially to improve the position of his client. The future historian will judge of opinions by facts, even though the present age should be disposed to judge of facts from opinions. In the course of his researches he will find that the troops which achieved our triumphs in Afghanistan, were sent on by Lord Auckland; that between the date of his departure for England, in the middle of March, and the middle of August, when the armies commenced their march to the capital, no additions of men or cattle were made. He will find that the first order issued by the new Governor General was not to halt, but to retire, leaving our prisoners in the hands of the enemy; and that the troops were as fully equipped for the enterprise in June as they were in August. He will ask for some stronger reason even than that furnished by the Duke's affirmation, why it was absolutely necessary for the safety of the troops that their march should be delayed to the verge of winter, when a hundred contingencies might have arisen to expose them to the risks which had proved so fatal to another British army in the previous winter. We rejoice that the Afghan war is to be made the subject of a distinct enquiry. The discussions will elicit many facts; and clear or confirm much which requires to be explained or corroborated. The impeachment of Sir John Hobhouse for his ambitious attempt to enlarge the British dominions in the East is not likely, we perceive, to come on before intelligence reaches England of the annexation of Scinde to the British Territories in India.

In the course of this debate Lord Auckland made a long speech in vindication of the policy he had pursued. "Unaccustomed as his Lordship is to public speaking," we are most agreeably disappointed at the vigor he displayed on the occasion. The tone of moderation which he adopted towards one who had shewed his administration no mercy, seemed to be duly appreciated by both sides of the House.

The Somnath Gate proclamation has created, as might have been expected, a strong sensation in the country. The Times cuts it to shreds, and ridicules Lord Ellenborough's having become a Hindoo by adoption. The Examiner treats it with the keenest contempt. The Morning Chronicle is in ecstasy. The Britannia, one of the first journals in London, condemns it in sober language which will find an echo in every honest bosom. The Monthly Times in which the value of the 'editorials' is exactly in an inverse ratio to that of the extracts and the arrangement, says in its sweetest accents: "It is a document at variance with the general tenor of the proceedings of the Governor General!" The Morning Post defends it out and out with a degree of courage worthy of a better cause. "It matters but little what is thought in England of the style of the Indian Governor's Proclamations. It matters much what is felt in India of the spirit which animates the British Government." The feeling in India may be described in three words, Disgust, Contempt, Hatred; disgust in the minds of Christians; contempt in those of the Hindoos, and hatred in the bosom of all true believers.

The melancholy intelligence has been received by this Mail of the entire loss off the coast of France of the Conqueror from Calcutta. With the exception of one cabin boy, every soul on board perished. Seldom has the loss of a vessel cast so deep a gloom on the face of society in Calcutta. Mr. Turton has to deplore the loss of a daughter, Mr. John Jenkins, of his wife and three children; and Mr. William Thompson, the Solicitor, of his wife and four children. Those two latter gentlemen proceeded to Suez on the Tenasserim, buoyant with the prospect of joining their families in England. At Galle they met the Hindustan, and learnt how cruelly their hopes had been blasted. Our regret on this occasion is heightened by the announcement that the bodies were treated with the greatest barbarity by the French on the coast, who stripped them and cast them into the sea. There is every reason to suppose that life was not extinct in every instance, and that proper attention might have rescued many from death. The Harkness, we see, has treated this conduct with becoming indignation; but the treatment of the bodies would have been much the same if the vessel had been lost on the English side of the Channel. The Cornish, the Welsh, and the Irish wreckers are as great monsters of cruelty as their brethren on the coast of France.

Sir Charles Metcalfe has been constrained to give up his tranquil retreat in Devonshire for the cares of Government. His long and succeeded to accept the Governor-Generalship of Canada; a post of no little difficulty, after the mismanagement of the last year or two. He is the first individual in English History who has been Governor of Jamaica, Governor General of India, and Governor General of Canada.

For other intelligence we refer to our extracts which we have made as copious as possible. The claims of the Opium merchants have been admitted; and the Scrip will be paid out of the twenty-one millions of dollars after all; only the merchants—whose losses have been more than made up through the destruction of the opium—cannot agree with Mr. Goulburn, about its actual value on the day on which it was seized; which might we think be easily settled by enquiring what would be the value of an insurance on the life of a man, under the new drop of Newgate.

THE HINDOOSTAN STEAMER.—The Express from Bombay, with the London Mail of the 6th February, arrived in Calcutta on Friday last at 11 A. M. and for the first time since the establishment of Steam communication between England and India, it has come without creating the smallest excitement. Our own steamer, the Hindoostan, had arrived the previous evening and put us in possession of all the intelligence. The Port of Calcutta has just reason to be proud of this splendid vessel. Her performance in the voyage to and from Suez has exceeded our most sanguine expectations; a distance of 4730 miles has been performed in less than twenty-one days, exclusive of stoppages. She left Suez on the 25th of February, was detained at Aden to take in coal, 43 hours; at Galle, 26; and at Madras 38, and reached Calcutta on the evening of the 23d of March. Under every disadvantage, arising from the novelty and defects of the arrangements for coaling, she has brought the Mail in less time than we have received it by express from Bombay. The boast of our Bombay contemporaries, that for the early receipt of news we must still look to the steamers attached to their port, has been destroyed by the first experiment. The capacity of this magnificent vessel has at once shewn that it is only under very peculiar circumstances that the Mail can ever be expected to reach Calcutta sooner by way of Bombay, than direct from Suez. When the present difficulties have been overcome, and facilities for taking in coal similar to those which the Government steamers enjoy, have been created by the Oriental Company, the Hindoostan and her sister vessels may be expected invariably to give us the mail two, and possibly three days earlier than the express. The superiority of this vessel over the Bombay steamers has been manifested in the most signal manner. We have sought in vain among the Bombay papers for a notice of the time the Atalanta remained at Aden, and cannot therefore ascertain the number of hours occupied respectively in the voyage between Suez and Bombay, and Suez and Calcutta. But between Suez and Aden, the Bombay vessel was behind the Hindoostan by more than fifty hours. The Bombay Times was quite correct in saying that the steamers belonging to that port must look about them now they had such a competitor in the field, or rather on the waters. His worst fears and our highest hopes have been realized. Bombay must get larger and better steamers, or relinquish the dignity of being the steam port of India.

The power of the Hindoostan having now been demonstrated, it is to be hoped, that in the next trip she will be entrusted with the mails for Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta. Had the packets been put on board of her at Suez instead of being sent by the Atalanta to Bombay, we should have received all our letters and newspapers on Thursday last, at a charge of two annas for the former, and one anna for the latter, instead of being obliged to pay fourteen annas for every letter for the privilege of receiving it four days later, and three annas for every journal, the last numbers of which will not reach us till nine days after the Hindoostan was moored off Calcutta. It would perhaps have been unwise to have made any change in existing arrangements, while the success of this experiment hung in doubt; but after the superiority of this vessel has been thus unequivocally established, it would be preposterous to send our packets by way of Bombay.

ANNEXATION OF SCINDE TO THE BRITISH DOMINIONS.—One of the most remarkable features in our Indian career, is the rapidity with which the fate of principalities and kingdoms is decided. On the 20th of June, 1756, our factory in Calcutta was captured, our merchants were murdered or expelled, the name of the town was changed, and our connection with Bengal apparently closed for ever. On the 22d of June, 1757, we had won the battle of Plassey, and become masters of Bengal, Behar and Orissa. It was, however, reserved for Lord Ellenborough's administration, to crowd the events of a year into a month. On the 14th of February, the Ameers of Scinde were in full possession of their kingdom, and as sovereigns signed a treaty with the British representative. By the 14th of March, their whole army had been defeated; the British flag waved over the fort of Hyderabad; they had been placed in confinement on board our Steamers on the Indus; their country had become a province of the British empire; the navigation of the Indus had been thrown open to all nations; slavery had been abolished, and orders had been issued to construct a column of the captured cannon to receive the names of the victors, after the model of the column of Austerlitz.

The territory of Scinde has not been formally annexed to our dominions in so many words; but Sir Charles Napier has been appointed Governor of the province; and we may therefore infer that the kingdom of the Ameers has been converted into a British province. The Acts of Parliament which relate to slavery have been extended to the country, and its independence may therefore be supposed to have terminated. It is somewhat remarkable that while the Governor General reserves it for the Directors to determine what rewards shall be given to the troops, he does not appear to give them a voice in the still greater question whether Scinde shall belong to the Crown or to the Ameers. The three short comprehensive orders promulgated by him are acts indicative of permanent sovereignty. And unless the Directors or the Ministry therefore should command the restoration of the conquered country,—which would be an act of superlative folly,—we may consider the Delta of the Indus, to be as much part and parcel of the British dominions, as the Delta of the Ganges. Such a reversal of the orders of the Governor General by the Directors would indicate a diminution of that strong confidence which they have so signally manifested in the measures of Lord Ellenborough. It would lead to his immediate departure from India. When the Directors therefore have to make their election between the Governor General's return to the Board of Control or the retention of Scinde, it is very probable that they will feel disposed to keep the country, asking no questions for conscience' sake.

This conquest and retention of a country as large as Scotland could not have occurred at a time when it is likely to afford more interesting discussion. The charge against Lord Auckland's administration is the wanton and unprovoked invasion of Afghanistan, from the dictates of ambition, and the love of territorial aggrandisement. The commendation bestowed on Lord Ellenborough's Government is founded on his withdrawal from Afghanistan and his magnanimous declaration that he was content with the limits which nature had assigned to our empire on the 1st of October 1842, and that he intended to cultivate the arts of peace. While that charge and that praise was still ringing in the ears of Parliament, Lord Ellenborough's proclamations of the present month would be laid on the table, announcing that the Beloochees had lost five thousand men in a single battle, and that the extensive province of Scinde, lying on both banks of the Indus, had been annexed to the British dominions. We will venture to predict that if this intelligence should reach England in the midst of an impeachment of Lord Auckland for the invasion of Afghanistan, that impeachment will immediately abate.

On the three acts of sovereignty which we published last week there is little to remark. After the conquest of Scinde, to restore it to the Ameers, would be an act little short of insanity. If it was to become a province of the British empire, Sir Charles Napier had richly earned the title and emoluments of its first Governor. One consideration alone diminishes the value of the proclamations issued consecutively by the Governor General on this occasion. We mean the entire absence of all allusion to Major Outram's services. His defence of the Residency for three hours, with One Hundred men against Eight Thousand is an exploit, of which we have had no example since the defence of their position by Colonel Scott, and Mr., now Sir Richard, Jenkins at Seetabuldee. Lord Ellenborough is not wont to pass over such gallantry in silence. On the contrary he seems to plume himself on the distinction that during his viceregalty, military devotion and talent have been more nobly rewarded than under any former rule. Yet this noble exhibition of the highest qualities of a soldier meets not the slightest acknowledgement. Outram forced himself into honourable notice under Lord Auckland's administration, so did Rawlinson, Pottinger, Macgregor,—and the 'curse' of Auckland rests on them and their prospects. There appears to be such unexampled littleness in thus selecting as the victims of official displeasure, men who are guilt of no fault but that of having served their country with zeal, and raised themselves to distinction under the auspices of a previous Governor General, that we gladly turn from a subject which it is so painful to contemplate.

The abolition of slavery in a country abounding with slaves, before we have been a month in possession of the capital, or have an acre of ground at our command beyond the limits of our own encampment, is somewhat premature. It is preposterous to attempt thus to subvert one of the fundamental institutions of a country before we have obtained a firm footing in it. It is not to extend laws to a country in which we have not as yet the slightest means of enforcing them. Yet such is the unbounded glibness of the Bull, that it would be matter of no surprise to find it asserted, that we had a perfect right to conquer and occupy Scinde, in order that we might proclaim liberty to every slave.

MADRAS BIGOTRY.—We have recently been engaged in discussing an instance of bigotry exhibited in Calcutta by the Tagore Family, who have turned Dwarkanath out of society for having visited England. We have now to record an exhibition of bigotry at the Benighted Presidency, of a more melancholy character, in as much as the parties implicated in it are not priest-ridden Hindoos, but members of a Christian Church.

We need scarcely recal to the recollection of our readers the noble sacrifice made by Sir Peregrine Maitland of the post of Commander-in-Chief at the Madras Presidency, because he would not countenance the compulsory attendance of Christian officers at Heathen festivals, in violation of the dictates of their own conscience. A scholarship was established in Bishop Corrie's Grammar School in his name, either from funds appropriated by him to this object, or raised to commemorate his conduct. The first election of a Scholar for this exhibition is to be held on the 19th April, 1843; and an advertisement has just appeared in the Fort St. George Gazette stating the qualification of the candidate.

"Sir Peregrine Maitland's Native Scholarship shall be open to all Natives, whether Christians, Heathens, or Mahomedans, who shall have been at any time, after they have attained the age of twelve years, receiving their education at Bishop Corrie's Grammar School during the space of three complete years, provided they were born in the Diocese of Madras, and if Christians, are members of the Church of England, and shall on the day of their election have completed their fifteenth year and not exceed their nineteenth year of age."

So it appears that an Institution which cheerfully receives a worshipper of Kallee, and a votary of the false prophet, is closed against the child of a Dissenter; and a Dissenter who may be desirous of obtaining the benefit of this Scholarship, has no other chance but that of becoming a Churchman or a Mahomedan; for the Hindoos will not receive him. It appears to be more revolting to the Christian feelings of the Directors to receive the child of a humble, pious, laborious Missionary, not a Churchman, than the son of a bigotted Mahomedan or a superstitious Hindoo. Though we are entirely ignorant of the names of the Directors, or of the Secretary—and write therefore without personality—we may naturally suppose, that having been selected to dispose of Sir Peregrine Maitland's Scholarship, they participate in his sentiments on the connection of the state with idols. It is possible that some of them may have been among those who were loudest in denouncing the support given to Hindoo superstitions by the Madras Government; yet these men now come forward to tell the Hindoos, by their words and actions, that in their opinion Dissent is more objectionable than Hindooism; that the man who has been offering sacrifice to a senseless idol is more entitled to their countenance and support, than the man who worships the same God and Saviour with themselves, professes the same Christian truth, and is partaker of the same blessed hope of immortality,—but differs from them in the non-essentials of Church Government.

We fully admit that every man has a right to do what he will with his own; that the Christian Directors of this Institution have a right to expend their own money, or the money entrusted to them in establishing a purely Episcopal School, and to make the door so narrow that none but an Episcopalian can enter. If this rule had been adopted on the present occasion, any objection would have been unreasonable. But it is not an exclusively Episcopalian Seminary. It admits those who loath Christianity even in its most dignified and Episcopal form. It freely admits Hindoos and Mahomedans, and excludes none but Dissenters. It is true that the candidates, as we are told in paragraph seven, are to be examined "in the rudiments of religion, as set forth in the Creeds, Articles and Liturgy of the Church of England," but this is only adding absurdity to intolerance. The Directors are fully aware that not one of the Hindoo or Mahomedan candidates knows a syllable of the thirty-nine Articles, or ever heard of the Athanasian creed. The Directors must of necessity admit the worshipper of Doorga and the votary of Mahomed into the Grammar School, without catechizing him out of the Liturgy. The net is intended only to intercept Dissenters.

But the most notable part of the scheme remains to be told. The Scholarship, it is announced, will be void if the Scholar shall be proved guilty of immoral conduct, or in case he be a Christian, if he shall cease to be a member of the Church of England. It seems therefore that there are but two disqualifications; immorality and Dissent. And is this the evangelical doctrine which the Directors are endeavouring to inculcate on the Hindoos and Mahomedans in Bishop Corrie's Grammar School; that the man who forsakes the Church of England, however exemplary his Christian conduct may be, is in their estimation as unworthy of their support, as the rogue, the swindler, and the drunkard? Is it part of the religion of the Bible to brand the poor child of a Dissenter with the same mark of infamy which the Directors consider it necessary to fix on open profligacy of character? Having thus forced on the Heathen around them the remark; "See how these Christians hate one another," is it any wonder that Christianity should not make the same progress in India which it did in primitive times, when the Heathen exclaimed with admiration, "See how these Christians love one another?"

THE WHOLESALE DISMISSION OF THE OFFICERS IN THE SAUGOR AND NEHBUDDA TERRITORIES.—The measure which the Governor General has recently adopted in this Proconsulship is the most extraordinary on record in the History of British India. The Government in those provinces was administered by a Chief Commissioner, a Civilian; a first Assistant, also a Civilian, and ten or twelve gentlemen from the Military service. An insurrection broke out in the neighbouring province of Bundelkund, and spread into Saugor,—and the Governor General has at once turned out every covenanted servant of the Company, employed in the administration of the territory. Such wholesale vengeance is altogether unknown in our Government, and it is much to be questioned whether it be just in reference to the past, or politic in reference to the future.

The only plea on which this indiscriminate use of the beam can be justified, is the mismanagement of the province. This mismanagement again is inferred from the disaffection of the Chiefs. But it is quite possible that this disaffection may arise from the system of administration, and not from the personal delinquencies of those engaged out of the natural tendencies of a civilized Government established in the midst of savages; and that the personal efforts of the public functionaries may have served to check and to retard the result of these tendencies. We need not here repeat the hacknied expression that the British administration is the Gesetzgebende Kraft, the poor man's Government. All our institutions have in them this one predominant feature, that they tend to curb the oppressor, and relieve the poor. When we took possession of the country every little district had more or less its petty baron, who placed his chief distinction in being above the laws. We have curbed the power of the baron. We have placed him upon an equality in the eye of the law with his meanest retainer; and we have thereby given offence which can never be entirely obliterated from the minds of those whose consequences we have annihilated. Our efforts in this respect in other parts of India have been apparently successful; that is to say, we have effectually overawed opposition, and brought every man indiscriminately under the empire of laws—though if our fortunes were to begin to wane, we should doubtless find enemies as thick as the warriors in the passes of Cabul, grow up from beneath our feet. But in Bundelkund and the neighbouring territory, which abounds with tracts of hill and jungle, and wild fastnesses, we have allowed this race of petty barons to exist with little interruption. Their importance is derived from the array of their followers, and their independent mode of existence. That darling liberty we have been gradually curtailing. We have obtruded our judicial system, which is as abhorrent to them as ever the presence of the gauger was in Rob Roy's country. They begin to feel that the existence of our Government is incompatible with their independence; that they must be gradually absorbed in the general mass if our supremacy continues; that they must give their children a good education, and turn their followers into useful citizens. The restraint we impose on them becomes daily more galling. We have chafed and fretted their feelings, and rendered them ripe for any project which should pitch us and our government, with all its benevolence, into the sea. The country has been recently denuded of troops; this gave them hopes of success in any rising; and these hopes were confirmed by a rumour very generally spread through the country, that we had not only been defeated by the Affghans, but that the remnant of our troops was proceeding down the Ganges with all haste, preparatory to a general evacuation. The poor barons, encouraged by the surrounding chiefs, who share their feelings because they share with them the loss of importance, rose up in arms because they thought that, now was the day and now the hour, to recover their independence. It was not a popular but a baronial rising. The common people generally through India have gained by our impartial rule, which has been as equitable as their own countrymen, who rule under us, will allow it to be. And, there was perhaps no part of India in which the blessings of our administration had been more eminently felt by the poor, than in these provinces. Such was the remark of Lord William Bentinck when he passed through the country in 1832. But in proportion as we improve the condition of the people, and elevate their hopes, we exasperate the chiefs; and in India we can seldom be wrong in reasoning from the content of the people to the discon-any of these wise, but for our interference, would squander over them.

The disturbances are to be traced therefore to the principles of our own administration, and to the effect produced on the minds of the Bundelkand and Sangor Barons by our discomfiture in Afghanistan, and not to the mismanagement of our own functionaries; and their universal expulsion from office can be justified upon no ground even of political expediency. If there had been mismanagement, the blame would lie at the door of the controlling, and not of the subordinate, officers. Yet we are informed in the papers that the conduct of the Commissioner has been commended both by Mr. Robertson and Lord Ellenborough, and that he has been promised the first vacant post of equal dignity and emolument with that from which he has been driven. Mr. McLeod, who acted immediately under him, has been promoted, we see, to an office of higher pay. Upon what principle of justice than have the military officers who occupied civil stations in the district been, one and all, expelled, and deprived of those appointments for which they had for years been employed in qualifying themselves? Why should their prospects be so unceremoniously ruined, and they themselves be remanded in disgrace to their corps?

But the measure is equally as detrimental to the country itself as it has been to the interests of the discarded officers. The new men who are to supply their place, are unacquainted with the language, the habits, or prejudices of the people, and have an apprenticeship to serve to their new employment, before they can be acceptable to the community or useful to Government. Was it wise, or prudent, or statesmanlike, at this season of general discontent, to deprive the administration of men possessed of local knowledge and influence, and to make over a province in a state of disaffection if not of revolt, to those who are entire strangers to the people? In these extraordinary circumstances, our only consolation is derived from the local experience and high character of Major Sleeman, to whom the management of the country has been entrusted; but he must feel himself overwhelmed with labours which no human being can long continue to perform, assisted as he is by a machinery so entirely incompetent. Independently of his multifarious duties, civil and political in Bundelkand, he is charged with the superintendence of a country—the Sangor and Nerbudda territories,—containing 30,000 square miles and a population of two millions. Nothing but a miracle can prevent the new system's breaking down, even before it has destroyed the Major's constitution.

One of the greatest objections to the new arrangements is the union of political and judicial duties in the same officer. This has long been considered objectionable in principle; it is now becoming still more objectionable from the extent of country in which it has been established. We have always understood that it was Lord Auckland's intention to have separated these functions; and if he had ever enjoyed leisure he would doubtless have carried his wishes into effect. But that reform is now past hope. The political duties of both the Sangor and Nerbudda territories and of Bundelkand, have been incorporated with the Commissionership. The officer who is entrusted with the most complicated and harassing military and political duties, is the only appellate authority in a country as large in extent as the principality of Wales, and three times as populous. In a country where disaffection is only smothered, his political duties must necessarily occupy the largest portion of his time; and the labor of presiding over the judicial administration of this extensive region must be performed as leisure can be created. From the simple exigence of his position in a country where every chief is ready to revolt, the duties he owes to the people, as the final referee in all civil disputes, must be too often postponed to the duty he owes to Government as the conservator of political peace. Is this just to the people?

We have trespassed long on the reader's patience, but must add a word or two on the military organization of the constabulary force. We thought on the first blush of the thing that the formation of four battalions of military constables was intended to supersede the necessity of employing our regular troops in these territories; but we find that additional barracks are to be built, and several additional corps to be permanently cantoned in the country. The new force is to be employed in the ordinary judicial and fiscal administration of the country. The civil writs of the Courts are to be served, and the revenue is to be collected, by rifle men, and thus our government becomes emphatically "a government of sentry boxes." The objection does not lie so much to the nature of the weapon,—though the Court will doubtless object to the ruinous and useless expense of providing the constables with rifles;—the objection would be just as strong to the collection of rents at the point of the bayonet. This is at once to proclaim martial law throughout the country, to intrude on the inhabitants an army of strangers whose insolent demeanor, the very few officers placed over them, will be physically unable to restrain, and thereby to exasperate to a more intense degree the feelings of abhorrence with which the independent classes view the introduction of our fastidious laws.

On the whole the change which has now been made in the administration of this province is likely to reflect little credit on our national character, and to confer little benefit on the people. It is sudden, violent and capricious. It is based on an act of injustice towards meritorious officers, which by destroying all confidence in the equity of Government, destroys the strongest hold which Government has upon the zeal and fidelity of its officers.

THE REMAINS OF SIR WILLIAM MACNAGHTEN are now on their way to Calcutta and may be expected in a few days. They were recovered at a large price by Lady Macnaghten, from the well into which they had been cast. The body was recognized from its mutilated condition, and from the absence of the head and the arm which had been cut off by the Afghan ruffians who assassinated him. We have been given to understand that it is not intended to pay the usual public honours to the remains of this lamented public servant, though at the time of his decease he occupied one of the most important and responsible posts under this Government, and had been nominated Governor of the Bombay Presidency. The arrival of the body at Ferozepore was, we hear, fully known to the Governor General, but it was allowed to remain unnoticed. This disinclination on the part of his Lordship to permit any public recognition of the claims of the deceased to a public funeral, renders it of course improper in any subordinate authority at this Presidency, to adopt a different line of conduct. It is therefore much to be regretted that Lady Macnaghten did not direct it to be conveyed down the Indus to Bombay, where it would have been received with those demonstrations of public respect which are so justly due to one who occupied so conspicuous a place in the public administration. But though no official notice is to be taken of the arrival of Sir William's body in the metropolis of British India, we hope those who are entrusted with the management of his funeral will afford his numerous friends an opportunity of assisting at his interment, by making their arrangements as public as possible.

WEEKLY EPILOGUE OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 23.

— The Heralds gave us reason to expect another of Lord Ellenborough's proclamations in last night's Gazette, annexing Scinde to the British dominions; but it contains nothing beyond the three Orders which we received through the Dell's Gazette, just as our last number was going to press. The only announcement we have that the Talpura dynasty has ceased to reign, is contained in the order appointing Sir Charles Napier Governor of the province.

— The 9th and 55th Native Infantry are ordered to proceed from Ferozepore to Sukkur without delay together with No. 1, Light Field Battery.

— A letter from Baboo Oopender Mohun Tagore, which appears in this morning's Heralds, entirely confirms our statement that the expulsion of Dwarkanath Tagore from the society of the Tagore family was purely a religious act, and had no connection with the patriotic movement now in progress, upon which it has been subsequently engrafted. We republish an extract from that letter, because it sets the matter at once at rest. It is of some importance to record the fact on such unexceptionable evidence that the first Hindoo who returned from a visit to Europe, where he received the most distinguished reception, was immediately expelled from society, and treated as an outcast.

— The Nemesis and the Plato Steamers are ordered round to Bombay immediately, evidently with the view of their being employed in Scinde. But they will find the Indus present fewer facilities for navigation than the Yang-tse-kiang.

— A letter appears from Captain Englede in the Englishman of this day on the affairs of the Calcutta Docking Company. He says he attended the meeting of the Company, as the representative of twenty-two shares, and was anxious to show the proprietors that their affairs were mismanaged, and that by adopting a liberal scale of charges, they would attract more business and secure larger profits. He also wished that the estimates for the timber purchased during the last twelvemonth should be laid on the table and compared with the market prices. The circumstance that the dividends are decreasing every year, shows that there is something rotten in the concern. A heavy debt of 140,000 Rupees still exists, and the docks are going to decay. In his last paragraph he says, "The consequence will be that in a few years the property called the Docking Company will no longer exist." His warning will be unheeded like the voice of Cassandra. When did ever a Ditch Committee shut the stable door, till after the horse had escaped?

— The Star alludes to a recent Government order in favour of the pensioned soldier, which directs that he shall be paid at the rate of 2 shillings and 4 pence the Rupee instead of two shillings and six pence, which will give him an addition of a nearly a fifth to his slender pittance.

FRIDAY, MARCH 24.

— The Sunshine of yesterday announced the arrival of the Ellenborough Steamer, from Seas the 25th February.

— The latest accounts from Hyderabad are those brought by the Suezris Steamer to Bombay, and they extend we believe to the 7th of March, up to which date no attempt had been made on Sir Charles Napier's post. It is said that the Belooches after their defeat at Meeanee, broke up into parties and dispersed. The wounded officers belonging to the Bombay Army had arrived on the Suezris; but from a hint thrown out in the papers it would appear that the Bengal officers who had been wounded were to be sent up the Indus on to Ferozepore.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25.

— It appears that the Hindoostan Steamer left Suez eighteen hours after the Atalanta Bombay Steamer, and reached Aden, thirty-six hours before her. The distance is 1340 miles, which the Hindoostan made in 146, and the other vessel in 200 hours! The Express from Bombay reached Calcutta yesterday morning about half past eleven, twelve hours after the papers by our own steamer had been delivered.

— The intelligence from Bombay is somewhat alarming. The Chopatra Steamer had come in from Cutch on the 15th March, with intelligence that the Ameers of Scinde had been rescued and that the fort of Hyderabad had through treachery fallen into possession of the Ameer of Khyrpore. It was derived by the authorities in Cutch from a person who left a place ten coss from Hyderabad on the 5th of March; but the intelligence direct from that place extended to the 7th, when no attack had been made. The Bombay Times, by a comparison of dates, pronounces the intelligence unfounded.

— Moulmein papers have been received to the 15th but they contain no intelligence. The Cholas had been raging with much violence and the casualties were duly recorded in the Chronicle. Some individuals of delicate nerves have it seems been frightened by this record of mortality; and the Editor has very considerably put it in the back ground.

— No official notice having been given of the arrival of the Tenasserim Steamer at Madras, no public Mail was sent on by her. She made a splendid run to that Port and was detained there only five hours. The Hindoostan was detained 38 hours.

— The latest accounts from Scinde contradict the report that eight officers had fallen into the hands of the enemy, but Capt. Ennis, of the 21st J. I. had been made prisoner by them, and most barbarously murdered and thrown into the river.

— The Agra papers state, that the Governor General intended to occupy the palace of Agra till the 1st of May; that a strange yellow liquid had lately rained at Futteypore; and that a party had been given by the station to the Governor General at which the health of the Hero of Hyderabad was not drunk.

MONDAY, MARCH 27.

— The Landholders' Society has come to life again. The Star of this morning has a long and interesting account of the Meeting held on Wednesday last. Baboo Dwarkanath's speech was by far the most interesting; and the most agreeable part of this speech was that in which he promised at some future time to put into the hands of the Society a paper now in course of preparation, more fully detailing his proceedings in England, and the feelings of the Indian Authorities, Her Majesty's Government and the British people. We see the Society has appointed a Sub-Committee to prepare a communication to Government on the Registry Act. The 22d Article of the Regulations of the Society which has been dormant for nearly two years, is to be acted upon from the present time, and the Society is to meet once a month.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that the son of Meer Wazir is on the throne of Cabul just now and that nothing but the prospect of the Dost's return keeps the people from murdering Akbar Khan who is very unpopular. The intelligence from Lahore regarding Dost Mohamed is that he has been soliciting aid from Shere Singh to punish the King of Bokhara. It would not be amiss if the British Government were to assist him with two or three lakhs of Rupees, to chastise this perfidious monster, the murderer of Stoddart and Connolly.

— The investiture of the Grand Crosses of the Bath is to take place, says the Agra Utkhar, on Monday the 20th. The Armory has been cleared out and arranged for the occasion, and the Somnath Gates placed at the Northern end.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28.

— The Harkara states that letters from Hyderabad of the 7th of March mention that the Ameers were in confinement with a strong guard over them. The Bombay Times which came in a week ago gave us intelligence from thence of the same date. It is in reference to intelligence of a later date that the dispatches from Cutch relate; and about which some anxiety is reasonably felt.

— From the same paper we learn that the Privy Council has decided the suit of Raja Mitrujeet Singh versus the heirs of the widow of Raja Jee-wunt Singh. The suit has been twenty-eight years in progress. Independently of the costs incurred in the various courts in this country, the expenses of the appeal in England have amounted to 100,000 Rs. the sum in dispute being 111,000. Of the English costs the Appellant is sentenced to pay 70,000 Rs. and the Respondents 30,000!

— The Calcutta Star of this morning affirms on the strength of a letter from England, that the Aerial Steam ship is no joke; that some of the most scientific men in the land are deep in a plot which will knock the Hindoostan on the head, and supersede this slow coach. Speaking of the Hindoostan, we are somewhat anxious to learn whether Capt. Engledue really intends to start her as he advertizes, on Good Friday. When Lord Mansfield, who never allowed suits to run into arrears, we do not say twenty-eight years, but twenty-eight days if he could avoid it, had unwittingly declared his determination to sit in Court on Friday, one of the gentlemen of the bar said that in that case his Lordship would be the first Judge who had ever sat on Good Friday, since the days of Pontius Pilate. The rebuke had the desired effect. Certainly if Capt. Engledue starts the Steamer on Friday, it will be the first Steamer which ever left the port of Calcutta for Suez on Good Friday.

— The Englishman's London Correspondent states that Dr. O'Shaughnessy was to accompany Sir C. Metcalfe to Canada; and the Harkara's Correspondent affirms that Lord Ellenborough and the Court of Directors are already at issue, on more points than one; that his Lordship has been proposing to turn off all the Collectors and appoint Natives. How the Old Hindoo and the Mookerjee Baboo will rejoice at this news. The Court however are not disposed to sacrifice the Collectors, or the revenue either. They also object to Lord Ellenborough's uncourteous dismissal of political officers. What will they say to the wholesale expulsion in one day, of the whole of the officers of the Sanger and Nerbudda establishment?

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29.

— The last Calcutta Gazette announces that the services of Major Pottinger have been placed at the disposal of the Government of Bombay; that is, he has been remanded to his corps;—but this circumstance demands a distinct notice, which we shall not fail to give it next week. The Star now informs us that Lieut. Charles Brown of the Bengal Engineers, has been appointed Commissioner in Scinde, in succession of Major Outram!

— The Englishman announces the approaching departure of D. L. R. to England. He is the last of our Indian posts; of that band which included the names of J. G. and H. M. P. and R. A. M. The stern events of the last three or four years have given a more practical, perhaps a more vulgar, tone to the minds of men, and left us few sympathies for the Munia.

— The intelligence from Scinde is pleasing. The rumour of an attack on Hyderabad and of its successful issue turns out to have been false. The Indus Steamer had arrived at Bombay from Karachi the 13th March, and reports that the country was perfectly quiet. But the Bombay Government will not on this account remit the despatch of troops to strengthen both Hyderabad and Sukkur, and to convince the Belooches of the hopelessness of resistance.

— The Harkara has the following notice in his paper of this morning: "We have seen at Messrs. Hamilton and Co's. a splendid 'Triumphal Vase,' designed and executed, for the Governor-General, probably to be displayed on the occasion of the installation of the G. C. B. It is in silver-gilt, and bears, embossed on its the names of the principal places CABUL—GHUZNE—JUGDELLUCK—JULLALABAD, &c., where we gained our principal victories. It is altogether a splendid work." If our advices from Agra be correct, the vase will be too late for the investiture, which we hear, took place on the 20th instant. Lord Ellenborough was seated on Akbar Khan's black throne, according to our informant; Sir G. Pollock and Sir W. Nott advanced to the foot of it, and the ceremony of installation was completed.

Dwarkanath Tagore.

I shall here relate the substance of the proceedings connected with the subject of this excommunication. When news arrived of Dwarkanath having left England for his home, and when he was daily expected, some of the members of the Tagore family, through pure religious motives, apprehending a fatal disgrace to the family, if they were to receive him in society as they used to do before, proposed to excommunicate him on his return and agitated this subject by frequent interviews with each other. Upon this, certain members, I believe to the number of three or four only, agreed upon the subject of the intended excommunication, while the others did not yield to their solicitations, believing it would be inconsistent with their avowed acts and deeds to conform to such a proposal. Things remained in this undecided state for some time. When on the return of Dwarkanath a meeting was held at the house of my respected relative, Baboo Hurroocomar Tagore, in which both sides of the party met to discuss on the feasibility, or otherwise of the propriety of the subject in question. I was present at this meeting, and I hereby distinctly state the reasons, that actuated the opposed party to enforce their plan of suggestion. They were based purely on religious principles, and no mention of the said letter to the Court of Directors was even distantly hinted at. From the well-known orthodoxy of Baboo Hurroocomar, I do not believe, that he ever subscribed to such a sentiment as attributed to him in your editorial, or if he did subscribe, I do not think, he ever understood its purport. Either he or you must have been hoaxed in the matter. I will not pay him such a bad compliment or offend his religious feelings, as to even suppose him capable either to express such sentiments or subscribe thereto without knowing their intent and purposes, for I know them to be directly opposed to his professed religious tenets, and that alone combined with his long standing difference of religious opinion with Dwarkanath actuated him to adopt this rash measure even at the sacrifice of many interests which are dear to him. But, Sir, the real fact, as I am given to understand, is, that the party acting as leader in the affair, to screen his own inconsistency before his European and other friends, has been busily engaged in manufacturing this version of the case. It is a pure offspring of his fertile brain. Neither you nor my suspected relative Baboo Hurroocomar has any share in it.—Beng. Hurk. March 23.

JUBILEE MEDALS.

The Baptist Missionary Society have had two medals struck off in commemoration of the jubilee. The larger medal has an impression of the well-known head of Carey on the one side, and the following inscription on the other:—

"BAPTIST MISSION."

Formed October 2d, 1793; commenced in East Indies 1793; West Indies 1813; Western Africa 1840.

Stations 157; Missionaries 71. Teachers and Native Preachers 127; Members upwards of 30,000; Scholars about 18,000. Scriptures translated into forty languages and dialects; copies issued in the year 1841, 8,5000. Slavery abolished August 1st, 1838.

The whole surrounded with the motto that carried the venerable founder through times of the greatest distress and destitution to the accomplishment of the great object for which he came to this country.—"Attempt great things for God—expect great things from God."

The smaller medal has on one side an impression of the house at Kettering in which the Society was formed—an excellent impression; on the reverse medallions of Carey, Fuller, Sutcliffe, Pearce and Ryland, with the Word of God open as a centre-piece. The whole encircled with the words,—"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord. Zech. c. 4, v. 6." Several of these medals have been received in India.—*Cal. Christ. LORD ELLENBOROUGH.

"I learn, that the East India direction are terribly sore at some of Lord Ellenborough's freaks. His last letters contained a scheme for entirely remodelling the system of collection of revenue. He says, he has with him three accountants, in whose talents he places the highest confidence, and that they have examined the accounts of many collectors, and although he does not in precise terms impugn their probity, he speaks of them upon the whole as very unfit and incompetent servants."

"These accountants have drawn up a plan, by which a uniform system of accounts is to be adopted in all collectorates, to be managed entirely by natives, under the supervision of a head office at Calcutta, thus doing away with a large number of lucrative civil appointments."

"He concludes his despatch by stating, that he expects the thorough and entire confidence of the direction, without which he cannot continue to hold the office of Governor-General; that he has many new plans to introduce, and great reforms in all the services to make, and that he cannot carry these out, unless the Directors place implicit trust in him, and leave every thing to his management, or take the alternative of his at once resigning. This financial plan was immediately answered in a despatch, objecting in the most decided terms to these or any similar alterations; declaring, that the Directors believe the management of revenue affairs to have been conducted most ably and honestly by their servants, that they considered it of the utmost importance to prevent the natives having any idea of the state of their balance sheet: and enquiring how it was possible, that three recent importations from London, could understand the affairs of the Company in a few weeks, better than men of acknowledged talent, whose lives had been spent in managing them. The despatch then examined in detail all his objections to the present system, refuted each, and concluded by expressing the confidence of the Directors in the ability of their servants, and in the correctness of the present system. This despatch was sent for approval to the Board of Control, and was returned to the India House for modification."

"After a day's delay, it was again sent to the Board with expressions of regret on the part of the Directors, that after mature consideration they declined using any milder language. The matter was referred to Sir Robert Peel, who directed it to be sent as it was."

"Should Lord E., therefore, have any objection to making a comfortable meal on his own words, he must resign."

"The Directors, it is understood, are greatly annoyed at his conduct, in depriving so many of the politicians of their places."—Beng. Hurk. March 23.

To Correspondents.

Indoctrus, we hope to take up next week.

A Subscriber, must consult those learned in the law. In our lay judgement a man cannot be seized in execution of a decree on the Sabbath; but we may be wrong.

One of the Meeting, at Jessore, has our thanks for his letter. We reserve ourselves however for the Catalogue of Grievances.

The valuable paper on Education at Bombay, we have been obliged to "take out of the forum" to make room for the contents of the mail, which in Editorial phraseology "won't keep."

Many thanks to our Agra friend for his letter; which will appear next week.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ISLAND OF MAURITIUS.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

I beg to send you an extract of a letter just received from the Mauritius.

"I have been several times preaching to the Coolies in the bazar and in different parts of the town

—it would be a good thing to send Missionaries on purpose for them; a noble field presents itself here, even better than India, because the people being away from the influence of brahmins and family connexions, together with various prejudices and dumb idols, they would be more disposed to listen to the preaching of the gospel—indeed, the very circumstance of their being in a strange land, would induce them to attend to the missionary. They were very glad to hear me speaking to them, and flocked all round me, and seemed sorry when I had done. Regarding the coolies, of whom so much has been said in the papers, I made many enquiries both from themselves and others; those of them who are employed in the plantations get generally 5 Rs. per month and one meal of rice per day and a little salt; they work hard, and are sometimes beaten and put in the stocks, &c. in case they do not work well, or are guilty of any trifling offence. From all that I have yet learned concerning them, it seems that a good planter uses them well, and they like to stay; but that others use them very ill, and they deeply regret their having come here at all; that they are sometimes made to begin work as early as 3 o'clock in the morning and kept at it until night, with but little time allowed them to eat; that when the stipulated period of 5 years has elapsed many of the planters will not allow them to go away when they wish, but retain them by keeping some part of their pay. This, a native told me, I cannot avouch for the truth of it. On the other hand, those who are qualified for house work get more pay, 10, 12, 16, and even 20 Rs. per month; they are no doubt better off than they would be in their own land; 70,000 coolies are now required on the island, and if not got, there will be a great failure in the crops.

AN ERROR RECTIFIED.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—In a recent No. of the Friend of India, you publicly announce "that Mootee Baboo has earned the gratitude of Society by offering 10,000 Rs. to the first Hindoo who should marry a widow." I beg to say that such is not the fact. That offer has been made to any of his sons, not to any Hindoo. His sons wisely judging that the money of their father will ultimately come to them, will not infringe a custom which will bring on them the odium of their countrymen.

The error would have been rectified earlier had I the honour of seeing that No. before. Your Calcutta Contemporaries have frequently committed the same error, and they will be good enough either to insert this denial or otherwise announce it in any way they wish.

I am, Sir,

Your humble Servant,

WOMES CHUNDER MOOKERJEE.

THE COLLEGE OF FORT WILLIAM.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Allow me a few remarks on your Editorial reply to my letter on the studies of Fort William College, in your issue of the 2d instant.

You do not state my sentiments fairly when you make me come to the conclusion that it is better to study Persian and Hindoo for the Upper Provinces, merely because they go to form Oordoo.

I gave two other reasons, one that Hindoo (and not Oordoo) is spoken and understood by a vast majority of the people; and the other that Persian would of itself almost enable a Civilian to conduct his Cutcherry duties. Your illustration of studying "the Saxon, the Latin and the French" for the purpose of acquiring English, does not apply to my real argument, not one of those languages being spoken by any portion of the English nation, nor monopolizing in any degree the medium of official business. The Judges in Wales are, I believe, expected to understand Welsh, although English is the language of the Courts.

I think it may be gathered from your article, that you are an advocate for teaching young Civilians the "language of the million" as well as the lan-language of the Courts, and still with apparent inconsistency you reject the widely spoken Hindoo.

Again, you seem to think that the studies of the young Civilians will have an influence on the efforts "to give a uniformity and a fixity to the Oordoo official language," and that the study of Persian is likely to perpetuate the too great intermixture of the Persian, but you do not notice, that an antidote is provided for this bane in the study of the popular Hindoo. Who so well qualified to promote "the formation of a good model of Oordoo" as the man who is acquainted with Persian and Hindoo? And on the contrary is it not to be feared that men acquainted only with Bengalee and the unfixed Oordoo are likely to contribute to keep this latter dialect in its state of "glorious uncertainty," or perhaps even to make confusion worse confounded by the admixture of some other villainous compounds?

I will conclude by repeating, that on the subject of your Oordoo Bengalee scheme, especially in its relation to the North-Western Provinces, "I have my uoots —"

Yours faithfully,

OODASSEN.

10th March, 1843.

P. S. What do you say to the following scheme? The Bengal students at Haylebury learn Sanskrit, Persian and Oordoo. Now, suppose their attention were confined to Sanskrit and Persian, the latter, including so much of Arabic as is contained in Lee's "Jomer's Persian Grammar." These languages not being spoken in India might be acquired in England with almost as much facility as here, and in two years with a little additional attention to this point, a sufficient knowledge might be gained for all useful purposes. Here their classico-oriental course might be considered to end, and then on their arrival in this country they might commence the Vernacular course, learning Hindoo and Oordoo for the North-West and Bengalee and Oordoo for Bengal. Encouragement being held out for those who had abilities and inclination for higher acquirements. The due proportion of Hindoo and Bengalee students might be secured by authority. I confess the course to be pursued in case of the necessity of future transfer from Agra to Bengal, and vice versa presents a difficulty beyond my powers of selection; I dare say it would not be insuperable in the hands of Government. But I have written more than enough on a subject in which I have no personal interest — so Farewell!

COLLEGE STUDIES.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Every man has his favourite weakness and your's appears to be "the vernacular for the use of the Mofussil Courts." I observe that you have assailed the College of Fort William for still continuing to instruct its ingenuous youth in the Grammar of "the exploded Persian," and have turned with considerable acerbity on an unfortunate correspondent whose defence of the existing routine of studies appeared in your paper of the 2d March, under the signature of Oodassen;—nevertheless the majority of Civilians employed in the N. W. P. would, I fancy, if called upon for their opinion pronounce your views erroneous. In the first place Persian is not completely exploded; one office, that of Special Commissioner* still uses it in all its vernacular proceedings and many more do so more or less as circumstances require. It is true however that in our ordinary Courts of justice, Oordoo has been universally substituted. In the next place it is one thing to abolish the use of Persian, and another to introduce the "language of the people." The first has been accomplished. The latter never will be—and the reason of this is that the people at large have no fixed language. The vernacular of the Upper Provinces varies in every district and even in different parts of the same district. It is all Oordoo; but what language is Oordoo? Simply a mixture of Persian and Hindi, the proportions of each used being left to the taste, the knowledge, or habits of the speaker or writer. The consequence is that the proceedings of the Court are held in a language as unintelligible to the people as was the much abused Persian; but even supposing that such was not the case but that the villager with his regale across his shoulder and "his lohne-bund lathee" in his hand could come into Court and understand every word that was spoken it would prove nothing against the system of College study; for admitting, as I suppose you do, the existence of very different dialects of Oordoo in different parts of the country, what more proper preparation can there be, for the Civilian destined for the N. W. P. than a tolerable grounding in the elementary parts of the language, &c. he is to speak—to wit, Persian and Hindi—which will enable him to mix them to suit his district; and I can assure him he will have to vary the proportions at each move. The fact is, that the change of language was, as regarded these provinces, a mere piece of claptrap. Government took away from its officers the use of a fixed, easy, and most excellent business language, and substituted an awkward, unmanageable mouthy and worst of all ever-varying dialect which may or may not happen to be intelligible to the hearer. That the measure was acceptable to the people was a mistaken notion. The mass of the people to this day call the language of the Courts Furree, and the only effect of the change was to bother the heads of offices and the Amlah. Persian is the favourite business of this part of the world, witness the Hindoo Native States in which it is universally used—but where it might be naturally anticipated that the Hindi would be adopted.

Yours, &c.

AMICUS CURIAE.

Mofussil, 10th March, 1843.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have been in Cutchery and there received a petition, of which I cannot deny myself the pleasure of sending you part of the opening sentence. Will you tell me of what country it is the vernacular?

Khodawundee punj beega pookhtu araze mey ek dehn chah monroosee fidoes kee ki lunan Ujab Sing vooxoorg fidoes ke junah Jehan Mul-jasee Padshahce maf shoohd bood!!!

A true bill upon my honour! I have copied it word for word. Now this is not "the language of the people" be-devilled by my Amlah or by myself, but the spontaneous effusion of the petitioner. How could I have understood it had I not had the benefit of instruction in Persian from that respectable Moonshce of Fort William College, Abdoolah! You will say perhaps it is no language at all. It is not Oordoo certainly, nor Persian, but it is a language which one of "the People" has chosen to adopt, and which a very slight knowledge of Persian renders perfectly intelligible but which a more Oordoo Scholar would be mightily puzzled by.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COURT AND FASHION.—The Royal accouchement is expected to take place in the latter end of March or beginning of April, after which it is said her Majesty and Prince Albert intend to visit Ireland at an earlier season than their last year's visit to Scotland.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager continues in the possession of excellent health at Conford House. It is the general expectation that the Dowager Queen and court will leave for Marlborough-house at the close of the ensuing month or early in March, and will remain in town two or three months, and then pass the summer at Bushy.

The marriage of the Princess Augusta of Cambridge and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz is to take place this month.

The marriage of the Crown Prince of Hanover is to take place in the third week of February, but the day does not appear to be fixed.

The health of Viscount Melbourne is quite re-established, and it is confidently stated by his friends that he will forthwith resume his attention to public business. It has, however, been thought advisable, in order to perfect his recovery, that his lordship should have the benefit of a few more weeks' country air before he resumes his attendance in the House of Lords. His lordship is at length able to use his left hand, of which he had lost the use by his late severe attack of paralysis.

The subscriptions to erect a monument to the late Lord Holland have already amounted to between 6000£ and 7000£.

The most distressing accounts have been received of the state of health of Sir C. Bagot, who is to leave Canada as soon as possible.

The Earl of Derby has experienced a slight return of the epileptic attack, from which he had been quite free for four years.

The will of the Countess Munster has been proved in Doctors' commons by Lord De Lisle, Gen. Wyndham, and Mr. Cameron, the executors. Her Ladyship gives to her three younger sons 50,000£; and the remainder of her property to her eldest son, the present Earl; her daughters, the two Ladies Fitzclarence, having been separately provided for by their maternal grand-father, the late Earl of Egremont.

The sale of the library of the late Marquis Wellesley occupied four days, and called forth an amazing deal of interest. The collection is in very good condition, and many of the books are valuable. It possesses the best editions, rather than works chiefly remarkable for being "excessively rare." There are first-rate, but there are no unique editions. Several of the classical works have MS. illustrations.—London Mail.

The Collegiate Institution of Liverpool, in Shaw-street, was opened on the 6th, with much ceremony. The Institution, is a large building, comprising three day-schools to accommodate the three great classes of society, with separate apartments, playgrounds, divisions of the lecture-hall, and so forth. The foundation-stone had been laid by Lord Stanley on the 22d Oct. 1840. A procession from the Town-hall took place in close carriages, and there was a numerous attendance, including the Bishop of Chester and several clergymen, the Mayor, Sir H. Douglas, Mr. W. Patten, and a great number of the Town-Council; Mr. W. E. Gladstone delivered the inaugural address. He started from the position that the state of our political institutions demands education for all classes, and concluded by stating that the Collegiate Institution was intended to communicate to the rising generation, as the rules declared, "sound religion in connexion with useful learning."

A vast mine was sprung at Dover on the 26th, to blow up the Round Down Cliff, the object being to make a roadway instead of a tunnel for the South-Eastern Railway. A mine, consisting of three cells, was planned and formed by Mr. Cubitt, the engineer of the Company, in the base of the cliff, into which 18,500 lbs. of powder was placed; and the ignition of the charges by the voltaic battery was performed by Lieut. Hutchinson, of the Royal Engineers. Punctual to their arrangements, the miners communicated the electric spark to the gunpowder by their connecting-wires, on the signal being given; the earth trembled to half a mile distant; a stifled report, not loud, but deep, was heard; the base of the cliff, extending on either hand to upwards of five hundred feet, was shot as from a cannon, from under the superincumbent mass of chalk seaward; and in a few seconds not less than 1,000,000 tons of chalk were dislodged by the shock, and settled gently down into the sea below. Not the slightest accident occurred.

A report has been again going the round of the press, to the effect that Lord Ellenborough returns immediately to England, probably in the Cambrian frigate; and that his lordship is to be succeeded by the Marquis of Tweeddale.

Sir Charles Metcalf, whose long habits of command in India, and whose subsequent experience in the West Indies so amply qualify him for the office, has been appointed Governor-General of Canada. He is to leave England for the seat of his government early next month.

The House of Assembly at Jamaica have voted the sum of 3000 guineas towards the erection of a marble statue of Sir C. Metcalf, to be placed in the square in Spanish Town. This grant, together with the general subscriptions throughout the colony, will enable the committee to perform a work that shall acknowledge with due honour a country's gratitude for the services of a good and great man.

Letters from Constantinople seem to leave no doubt, that Col. Stoddart and Capt. Conolly have been murdered at Bokhara. It is stated that they could have got away through the favour of the Russian political agent, but refused his assistance; and after a number of trials and sufferings, they were at last taken from prison to the market-place, where Col. Stoddart was first beheaded. Capt. Conolly could still have saved himself had he consented to embrace Islamism; but he firmly rejected the offer, and immediately fell under the headsman's knife.—London Mail.

The following anecdote shows that, like his great friend, "the Duke," Lord Hill was on principle opposed to warfare. The truly valiant warrior lamented the necessity of war when winning victories:—"The Lord Hill, when he heard of the successful results of the Indian and Chinese wars, was so overcome that he exclaimed, with tears of joy bursting from his eyes, "Thank God I have lived to hear of these glorious victories, and to know that there is an end to war, horrid war."—London Mail.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam ship, Bentuck, a magnificent vessel, was launched on the 19th January from the building-yard of Messrs. T. Wilson and Co., of Liverpool. The Bentuck is almost in every respect the twin-ship of the Albatross. She is built, in fact, from the same mould, and is consequently of the same burden, which is about 2,020 tons. The only difference is that in place of diagonal timber fastenings, she has diagonal timber ceiling—the two modes being equally approved by scientific men, and both so closely approximating to what is deemed perfection as regards strength, that argument in behalf of either resolves itself into a mere matter of taste, rather than experience, in their respective merits. A more beautiful model was never turned out of any yard. She has a fine figure-head of Lord W. Bentuck, a carved stern, with the coat of arms and motto, "Crainquez honte." Mrs. Williams undertook the duty of "throwing the bottle," and all being in readiness, at about 20 minutes past one o'clock, Mr. Thomas Wilson gave the necessary orders, and she started off splendidly, without a perceptible creak on her bed (notwithstanding her weight was nearly equal to her tonnage), but went on majestically along the ways, increasing in speed until she plunged into the deep, and released from her ties to land, bounded lightly, and rushed rapidly from the shore.—Ibid.

WHITEHALL, JAN. 26.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint Viscount Melville, Lord Belhaven, H. H. Drummond, Esq., James Campbell, of Craig, Esq., E. Twissleton, Esq., the Rev. Dr. P. Macfarlan, and the Rev. J. Robertson, Commissioners for inquiring into the practical operation of the Poor Laws in Scotland. And William Smith, Esq., Adv., to be Secretary to the said Commission.—Ibid.

HOUSE OF LORDS, FEB. 2.—OPENING OF THE SESSION.—The Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Buccleugh, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Wharnccliffe, having taken their seats in front of the throne, and the Speaker, with a number of Members of the House of Commons, having appeared at the bar, the Lord Chancellor proceeded to read the following speech:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by her Majesty to acquaint you that her Majesty receives from all princes and states assurances of a friendly disposition towards this country, and of an earnest desire to co-operate with her Majesty in the maintenance of general peace.

"By the treaty which her Majesty has concluded with the United States of America, and by the adjustment of those differences which from their long continuance had endangered the preservation of peace, her Majesty trusts that the amicable relations of the two countries have been confirmed.

"The increased exertions which, by the liberality of Parliament, her Majesty was enabled to make for the termination of hostilities with China have been eminently successful.

"The skill, valour, and discipline of the naval and military forces employed upon this service have been most conspicuous, and have led to the conclusion of peace upon the terms proposed by her Majesty.

"Her Majesty rejoices in the prospect, that by the free access which will be opened to the principal ports of that populous and extensive empire, encouragement will be given to the commercial enterprise of her people.

"As soon as the ratifications of the treaty shall have been exchanged, it will be laid before you.

"In concert with her allies, her Majesty has succeeded in obtaining for the Christian population of Syria the establishment of a system of administration which they were entitled to expect from the engagements of the Sultan and from the good faith of this country.

"The differences for some time existing between the Turkish and Persian Governments had recently led to acts of hostility; but, as each of these states has accepted the joint-mediation of Great Britain and Russia, her Majesty entertains a confident hope that their mutual relations will be speedily and amicably adjusted.

"Her Majesty has concluded with the Emperor of Russia a treaty of commerce and navigation, which will be laid before you. Her Majesty regards this treaty with great satisfaction, as the foundation for increased intercourse between her Majesty's subjects and those of the Emperor.

"Her Majesty is happy to inform you that complete success has attended the recent military operations in Afghanistan. Her Majesty has the greatest satisfaction in recording her high sense of the ability with which these operations have been directed, and of the constancy and valour which have been manifested by the European and Native forces.

"The superiority of her Majesty's arms has been established by decisive victories on the scenes of former disaster, and the complete liberation of her Majesty's subjects who were held in captivity and for whom her Majesty felt the deepest interest, has been effected.

"We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that it has not been deemed advisable to continue the occupation, by a military force, of the countries to the westward of the Indus.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"Her Majesty has directed the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you. Such reductions have been made in the amount of the naval and military force as have been deemed compatible, under present circumstances, with the efficient performance of the public service throughout the extended empire of her Majesty.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty regrets the diminished receipt from some of the ordinary sources of the revenue.

"Her Majesty fears that it must be in part attributed to the reduced consumption of many articles, caused by that depression of the manufacturing industry of the country which has so long prevailed, and which her Majesty has so deeply lamented.

"In considering, however, the present state of the revenue, her Majesty is assured that you will bear in mind, that it has been materially affected by the extensive reductions in the import duties, which received your sanction during the last session of Parliament, and that little progress has been hitherto made in the collection of those taxes which were imposed for the purpose of supplying the deficiency from that and other causes.

"Her Majesty feels confident that the future produce of the revenue will be sufficient to meet every exigency of the public service.

"Her Majesty commands us to acquaint you that her Majesty derived the utmost gratification from the loyalty and affectionate attachment to her Majesty, which were manifested on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to Scotland.

"Her Majesty regrets that in the course of last year the public peace in some of the manufacturing districts were seriously disturbed, and the lives and property of her Majesty's subjects were endangered by tumultuous assemblages and acts of open violence. The ordinary law promptly enforced was sufficient for the effectual repression of these disorders. Her Majesty confidently relies upon its efficacy, and upon the zealous support of her loyal and peaceable subjects, for the maintenance of tranquillity.

"We are commanded by her Majesty to acquaint you that measures connected with the improvement of the law, and with various questions of domestic policy, will be submitted for your consideration.

"Her Majesty confidently relies on your zealous endeavours to promote the public welfare, and fervently prays that the favour of Divine Providence may direct and prosper your counsels, and make them conducive to the happiness and contentment of her people."

The Earl of Powis in moving the Address congratulated the House on the prospects of peace, and proceeded thus. The next question to which I shall take the liberty of directing your lordships' attention is the conclusion of the war with China. We were all aware that nothing could equal the gallantry, the zeal, the spirit, or the energy of British troops or British seamen—(cheers)—but we did not expect that this war would so soon have been brought to such a happy result. Our troops and seamen had to encounter many difficulties and dangers, but notwithstanding, they have shown themselves worthy of their established reputation, and have taught the Chinese Emperor that peace is better with the British empire than a continuation of the present state of things—a state of things in which their own obstinacy had unfortunately involved them. It is with great satisfaction that I perceive the manner in which her Majesty has been pleased to characterize the exertions of the troops and seamen, both native and British, employed in this arduous service—(hear hear). The next subject to which I wish to direct your lordships' attention is the conclusion of the war in Afghanistan. That war has also been brought to a happy result. It would be unmanly if I attempted to deny the sad reverses which we previously experienced in the country, it would be unmanly if I did not admit that the difficulties under which we laboured in that country, in consequence of those reverses, were very great. It must be admitted, indeed, that our reverses in that country had been disastrous in the extreme. Our duty in the first place was to redeem the honour of the British flag, which had been tarnished, and in the next to restore to liberty the portion of her Majesty's subjects, both male and female, who had had the misfortune to be detained in captivity in Afghanistan. I will not now stop to raise the question, whether those ladies were justified in placing themselves in such a situation as to subject themselves to the chance of being involved in the manner in which they had been. It is sufficient to know that they were involved in such circumstances to make it our duty, in the first place, to vindicate the honour of the British flag, and in the second place to restore those captives to liberty. Happily both those results have been accomplished—(cheers). The first step in the great work was accomplished by the noble and gallant defence of Jellalabad by Sir Robert Sale—(hear, hear.) That was the first step in advance. I need not allude more particularly to the noble and gallant conduct of the troops under the command of Gen. Pollock and of Gen. Nott, in the various operations in which they have been engaged in Afghanistan, but I must be allowed to express the great satisfaction I feel at the manner in which her Majesty has been pleased to characterize the exertions of the forces in those countries. I am happy to say that not only have the British forces merited these encomiums, but that the native forces of the East India Company have proved themselves equally worthy with the British troops. Both the British and the native Indian troops are entitled to be highly lauded for their conduct during the campaign. I may be permitted to allude more particularly to this subject on account of the connections of my family with India. I have an hereditary feeling on the subject—(hear, hear.) His lordship having briefly alluded to the other matters noticed in the speech, read the usual address.

The Earl of Eglinton in seconding the address, briefly noticed that paragraph in the speech relative to Afghanistan, eulogising the conduct of the troops who were recently engaged there. He also noticed as briefly the peace which had been happily concluded between China and this country, as well as what had been effected in Syria, and the arrangements entered into between the Russian Government and Great Britain.

The Marquis of Lansdowne expressed his approbation of the judicious manner in which the Royal speech had been framed, with the view of preventing the expression of any difference of opinion as to the terms of the address. With regard to the Corn Laws specially, no mention of which had been made in that speech, he believed that no period had ever occurred in which greater embarrassment had been occasioned to the trade and internal resources of the country, than since the present Corn Laws had come into operation. He regarded the conclusion of the Treaty of Washington with satisfaction, not unmixed with regret that the granting of such large concessions had not been made the means of arranging other important matters of settlement with the United States, which still remained prolific causes of misunderstanding, and referred especially to the question of the Oregon Boundary and the Right of Search. In alluding to our Eastern successes, he took occasion to notice the prevailing impression that some unwillingness had been manifested on the part of Lord Ellenborough to re-enter Afghanistan, and to the proclamations in which the Governor-General had imitated the Schahs and Sultans to whom the country he now ruled over had formerly been subject. He complained of the paragraph in the Royal Speech by which the successful issue of the China war was attributed to the "liberality of Parliament," and contended that the increased means of conducting the war had been suggested by Lord Auckland, for whom also he claimed the honour of having pointed out the very plan of operations by which the expedition had at length succeeded. He implored the attention of Ministers and of the country to the means of securing and improving the trade with China, now for the first time laid open to the civilized world; and after speaking in feeling terms of the patience with which the great mass of those who had suffered severe distress had borne with their privations, concluded by declining to offer any opposition to the Address.

The Duke of Wellington, in reply, vindicated the justice of the Chinese war, and contrasting the force which had been employed by the late and by the present Government, claimed for the latter all the credit of having at last conducted it to a successful termination. He complained, that after the forbearance in the Royal speech of any allusion to our disasters in Afghanistan, the noble Marquis should have intruded such a topic upon that night's discussion; and, after referring to his own experience in India, and of military difficulties, declared that he was ready "to justify every order or movement, either one way or the other, the Governor-General had given since he took upon him the administration of the affairs of India." With respect to the Treaty of Washington, which had been also prematurely brought before their Lordships, he expressed his general approval of Lord Ashburton's conduct, but wished that all further discussion might be suspended until the papers were regularly before the House.

Lord Brougham, too, heartily concurred in the sentiment of universal exultation at the settlement of the differences of America, in comparison with the importance of which he was utterly indifferent to the sacrifices of a few miles of territory, or even of the navigation of the St. John's River. He then proceeded more in detail to defend the concessions which Lord Ashburton had made for the sake of peace, and contrasted most eloquently the blessings of such a policy with the horrors which our invasion of Afghanistan had entailed, not only upon the inhabitants of that country, but upon our unfortunate troops. Retaliation had been exacted for these horrors by devastation and excesses which he stigmatized as ruthless and superfluous—without object, except to gratify a fierce, brutal, and unchristian spirit of vengeance—and without result, except as working out a self-destructive policy which left on the minds of the Afghan an unquenchable abhorrence of the British name and character.

Lord Auckland shared with Lord Brougham the horror with which all war was to be contemplated, and had only entered upon that in Afghanistan, because, after long and painful hesitation, he felt convinced that it was essential to the very safety of England. He had at last determined to meet the threatening danger in advance, and the result was to dispel a cause of apprehension then imminent, and now no longer formidable because thus decisively met. He referred without asperity to the late orders issued by Lord Ellenborough, but would decline to follow his example in handling with him terms of depreciation and disparagement. He had laboured most earnestly during the last weeks of his administration to lessen the difficulties his successor would have to encounter, and his ill-success was owing rather to the force of circumstances than to any omission or mismanagement on his part. He defended the part he had taken in the direction of the several expeditions on the coast of China, and, without detracting from the vigour and activity with which the plans by which success was ultimately attained were carried out, he firmly believed that the same plans, and nearly the same amount of force would have been employed had there been no change of Government at all.

Lord Colchester endeavoured to exonerate Lord Ellenborough from any share of the blame which had been cast upon the British army for their excesses during the evacuation of Afghanistan, and described the difficulties the Governor-General had had to encounter upon his arrival in India. He found there a beaten army, a diminished revenue, the public works at a stand, and a mutiny among the troops. The revenue was now improving, the Afghan war had been concluded, and that in China, upon which so much blood and treasure had been uselessly expended by the languid operations of the late Government, was now brought to a successful termination.

The Marquis of Clanricarde declined to enter upon the Eastern questions until the papers were before the House.

Lord Minto defended the conduct of his late colleagues as to their naval operations on the coast of China; and was followed by Lord Ashburton, who, while deprecating a debate on the late treaty when there were so many other subjects before the House, explained that a settlement of the right of search had formed no part of his mission. On the boundary question he had made no important concessions which were not amply compensated, and he anticipated no difficulty on the subject of the Oregon territory.

Lord Haddington explained a mistake into which M. Guizon had fallen as to the number of cruisers employed by England in the suppression of the slave trade, and claimed credit for the present Board of Admiralty for the promptness with which a sufficient naval force had been despatched to conclude the Chinese war.—The Bishop of Exeter said that Great Britain was now for the first time to be introduced to China as a great and powerful country, and he hoped that advantage would be taken of such an event to make it known to the Chinese as a Christian country also.

After a few words from Lords Haddington and Minto, Lord Stanhope gave notice of a motion for the 9th inst., embodying an amendment which he had intended to have proposed on the Address.

The Address was then agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Lord Courtenay moved an address embodying the topics of the speech. He declared his peculiar satisfaction at the adjustment of the differences with America, and congratulated his hearers on the successes in Afghanistan, doing justice to the exploits of military valour, and to the no less striking examples of female fortitude, as exhibited in the East. He rejoiced in the fortune which had attended our efforts in China, and hailed in their results a hope of extended markets for our domestic produce; expressing a deep sympathy with his suffering countrymen, but deprecating all partial sacrifices as between the different classes of British industry, and avowing his confidence in the dispositions and abilities of her Majesty's present advisers to relieve the country and promote her welfare.

The address was seconded by Mr. P. Miles in alluding to Eastern events, he relied with peculiar gratification upon the pacific policy announced by our Indian Government, and upon the commercial prospects opened by our treaty with China. He touched, with praise, upon the arrangements concluded between England and America, expressed his regret for the domestic disturbances of last year, attributing them in great measure to the unprincipled endeavours of those who had excited the indignant; and declared his general approbation of the vigorous measures adopted to restore the credit and finance of the country.

Mr. C. Wood desired to reserve his judgment upon most of the points of the speech until the House should be in possession of further information; but gave his opinion decidedly in favour of the maritime right of visitation which was now claimed by England in her discussions with America. Generally speaking, he believed the speech would be satisfactory; but he lamented that on the subject of domestic distress it held out only sympathy, and no practical relief. With respect to finance, he apprehended that the state of affairs was worse than it had ever been before. Unless the produce of the income-tax should be double the amount at which Mr. Goulburn calculated it last year, the deficiency in the current quarter could not be made up.

Sir R. Peel trusted, that the address to be laid before her Majesty would be unanimous. On the subject of the American treaty he should be prepared to show, that, if it had not obtained for us all which we were strictly entitled to expect, it was, on the whole, an eligible adjustment, giving us more than had been awarded by the arbitration of the King of the Netherlands, and securing to us all that was really important in our claims. On the subject of finance, he admitted that there was a great deficiency. He had stated last year that, in addition to the deficiency which he had found on coming into office, he proposed to cause a further deficiency still. He had accordingly remitted duties on 700 articles; reductions had all taken effect; but the income-tax imposed to meet them had not yet come into productiveness. Undoubtedly there had been a great falling-off in the excise, mainly on the article of malt; but that had arisen in a great degree from the very unfavourable harvest of 1841. There still, indeed, existed severe distress; but let not the House infer thence that there must needs be a permanent diminution of consumption. Another cause of the late falling off had been the disturbed state of the manufacturing districts. This was not a fit occasion for entering at large upon financial statements; but he did now discern some favourable changes on which he could not forbear from founding good hopes. It was complained that the speech announced no new measure with respect to corn. He had no such great measures of change to propose as gentlemen seemed to expect. Whenever he should make a change, it would be a change accordant with the principles he had propounded; but he must always remember that in this country the general rule had been protection. He believed the reduction which had already taken place in the price of the necessities of life had actually verified his prediction that the income-tax would be compensated by the general cheapness of living.

Lord J. Russell, in reference to a notice, given before the debate, of a motion of thanks for the services of our officers in India, adverted to some Indian topics upon which he deemed it requisite that further information should be previously furnished—one, the vindictive excesses said to have been committed by our troops; the other, the share of Lord Ellenborough in issuing the directions which led to our successes. There were a couple of proclamations too remarkable to be passed over. One of them contained such a misrepresentation of a preceding Governor's policy as was seldom uttered even in the heat of party debate; and it breathed, with respect to Afghanistan itself, a spirit rather of revenge than of calm and statesmanlike policy. The other proclamation was so oddly worded that many people who had last year been taken in by the clever imitation of a debate in the French Chambers, and were therefore much on their guard against a second deception, were thoroughly persuaded this was another hoax. For his own part, he viewed it more seriously; especially in respect of the tone which it took, a strange tone for a Christian Governor, of reverence for the objects of idolatrous worship. These things, he owned, had raised in him some misgivings as to the judgement of the indiscreet intrusted with the grave and almost awful responsibility of governing India. With regard to the American treaty, he would say that he did not view it with the satisfaction which some seemed to feel; he doubted whether any treaty would be really advantageous which on its very face was detrimental to the country consenting to it. Coming to domestic affairs, he would declare that his experience of the past year had confirmed him in his objection to the sliding scale, and in his conviction that a fixed duty was the thing required. Under the present scale, the foreign wheat was poured in just as the home harvest was becoming available; the garden was watered at the moment when it was beginning to ruin. He had, however, heard nothing to-night which convinced him that Sir R. Peel would not yet make much further alteration in the Corn Laws. But on such a question to withhold alterations which were really intended, was vastly inconvenient and injurious, and left everything unsettled both for the grower and for the labourer. The agricultural members were now placed by the Government in a very awkward situation; the arguments on which they were put to defend the tariff were arguments which forced them to condemn the Corn Law, and vice versa. He was no subscriber to the opinions of the Anti Corn Law Leagues; he wished the Minister would propound something which should put an end to agitation. He was glad to hear that the prospects of the revenue were more favourable than they had been supposed; but he must say that the opinion he had always expressed, by his vote and otherwise, against the income-tax had been confirmed by the experience of what had recently happened.

Sir C. Napier and Mr. Wallage having spoken,

Lord Stanley censured Lord J. Russell for a premature introduction of the questions connected with Afghanistan. He would, however, now declare, that it was the intention of Ministers, on the approaching motion for a vote of thanks, to claim for Lord Ellenborough a share in the honour of our Indian successes. There might be faults to be found with the taste of particular phrases, but when the whole case, with all its facts, should be before the House, the House would judge of it as a whole, and then he should not fear their verdict—nay, he should scarcely fear the verdict of the noble Lord himself. If the Indian Government, in retiring within its limits, had left anarchy behind them in Afghanistan, it was that anarchy which the invasion of the country by the late Government had originally generated. He lamented the excesses of the Indian army, or rather of the undisciplined mass by which an Indian army is always followed; and he assured the House, that nothing was further from the mind of the Governor-General than to countenance the idolatry of the people under his rule. The noble Lord had blamed the Ashburton treaty as though it would have been easy to conclude a more favourable one; but if that was so easy, why had not the late Government done so in their ten years of Administration? He believed that the territory given up was valueless in an agricultural, and valueless in a military, point of view. If Lord Ashburton apprehended the separation of Canada from England, the boundary question, so far from being of less, must have appeared to him of so much the more importance; for when Canada should become a separate state, deprived of England's auxiliary resources, it would be of vital consequence to her to be protected by available limits from the encroachments of the United States.

Lord Palmerston, as it was his intention to bring the Ashburton treaty by specific motion under the notice of the House, would not now follow Lord Stanley into the details of the subject; but considered Lord Ashburton, by reason of his known opinions and connexions, to have been ill selected as a negotiator upon such a subject. The course taken by that noble person appeared to indicate either great incapacity in the Government, or great indifference in the negotiator. On the results of the Chinese war, Lord Palmerston expressed himself glad to concur in the congratulations of the speech. As he and his friends had been responsible for beginning that war, they could not but rejoice in its successful conclusion; and it was but fair to admit that the present Ministers had conducted it with as much earnestness and vigour as if they had themselves commenced it. As to India, he wished to know whether the thanks proposed were to include Lord Ellenborough; for he was satisfied that Lord Ellenborough had not been the author of the instructions by which the success had been directed; and as to his proclamations, they had really become a laughing-stock. Instead of thanking such a Governor, the Cabinet should have recalled him. After a few words about Syria, whose present affairs he treated as of minor importance, he adverted to the hardships of the income-tax upon persons of small means; he concluded by asking whether the number of cruisers on the coast of Africa was about to be reduced, and whether any change had been made in their instruction?

Sir R. Peel answered both questions substantially in the negative; and took that opportunity of expressing his regret that the attack on Lord Ellenborough had not been made earlier in the debate. He had waited before he rose to see whether any other member was about to speak; having then addressed the House, he was precluded from going into the question now; and it was that rule of the House which alone withheld him from entering into the vindication of his noble friend.

Sir R. Inglis would not condemn the general Policy of Lord Ellenborough, but he must express his deep disapprobation of that passage in one of the proclamations in which a Christian Governor, on a subject connected with religion, employed language such as no Mahometan ruler would have suffered himself to use. It was not, as Lord Stanley had put it, a matter of taste; the Government ought not to take that sort of ground, they ought to discontinue such an officer.

Mr. Villiers complained that the speech disregarded the sufferings of the people at home.

Lord Howick thought it the duty of the House, passing by all minor topics, to apply itself to the subject of the national distress. It had been said that the Opposition were acting unfairly in making charges against the Governor of India before the day fixed for the discussion of his conduct. On the contrary, the unfairness would have been in keeping back charges until that day. He thought much expiation would be requisite, both on the subject of the idolatrous ship, and on that of the military excesses, before the House could properly concur in any vote of thanks.

Mr. Haime was satisfied with the results accomplished in China and Afghanistan.

Mr. Ferrand said no good would come till machinery was taxed. The Opposition might cheer, and call upon the right hon. Baronet to carry out their principles; he had been seduced by their smiles last year: and how had his measures answered? Mr. Ferrand then challenged any of the members of the Anti-Corn Law League to meet him and argue their question openly in any town of Lancashire or Yorkshire.

Mr. Ewart censured the sweeping generality of Mr. Ferrand's imputations, and recommended the reduction of the duties on tea and on sugar, the opening of the trade with Ceylon, and above all the alteration of the Corn Laws.

Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. G. Banks, Mr. Sergeant Murphy, Dr. Bowring, Mr. M. Phillips, and Capt. Peobell having spoken, the address was carried without a dissentient voice.

Feb. 3. Lord Courtney having brought up the report of the Committee of the House of Commons on the Address, Mr. Walter rose; after expressing his approbation of those topics of the Address which refer to our foreign relations, and commending the Government for the manner in which the late disturbances had been suppressed, he adverted to the Corn Law, and declared his opinion to be still, as it always had been, in favour of a fixed duty as against a sliding scale.

Mr. Ward said the existing Corn Law could not stand; the agriculturists were becoming sensible to the necessity of changing it; and in the manufacturing districts the feeling against it was daily increasing.

Mr. Liddell rejoined at the declaration made on the previous night by Sir R. Peel against further changes on this subject; and he was sure that any intimation from the right hon. Baronet of an intent to make more alterations would have produced vastly more alarm than was likely to arise from any now existing cause.

Mr. Villiers asked whether Sir R. Peel had meant, in his speech of the preceding night, to declare himself against all change in the Corn Laws?

Sir R. Peel said that he would resist any alteration in the existing law: he saw no other system which he thought likely to work so well; nor had he ever heard of any proposal which would give absolute security to the agriculturists against all change, except indeed a total abolition of duty, which to be sure would protect them against further reduction, because it would leave nothing to be reduced.

The following notices of motions have been given:—Sir T. Fremantle, on behalf of the Secretary for the Colonies, said that he would, on the 14th of Feb., move a vote of thanks to the officers and men engaged in the Chinese war. Also, on behalf of the First Lord of the Treasury, that he would, on the 16th of Feb., move a vote of thanks to the Governor-General of India, and to the officers and men employed in the military operations to the west of the Indus. Mr. Roebuck that he should, on the 16th Feb., move for a committee to inquire into the policy which led to the war in Afghanistan.—London Mail.

ASSASSINATION OF SIR R. PEELE'S PRIVATE SECRETARY.—FROM 23D TO 25TH JAN.—On the 20th, a most determined attack was made upon Mr. Drummond, the private secretary of Sir Robert Peel, at about half-past three o'clock, in the space between the Admiralty and the Horse-guards, where he was shot at by a man who approached him from behind. The assassin walked close up to Mr. Drummond, actually put the muzzle of the pistol into his back, and then fired. Immediately after the discharge, a policeman rushed up, and seized the criminal, who had returned the pistol with which he had shot Mr. Drummond to his breast, and had drawn out another from the same place, and was in the act of pointing it at Mr. Drummond, when the policeman seized him and pinioned his arms from behind. The pistol was discharged, but the aim of the assassin being thus diverted, the contents did not touch any person. Mr. Drummond was immediately conveyed to his brother's bank, and afterwards to his own residence, where Mr. Guthrie, Mr. B. Cooper, and Mr. Jackson examined the wound. It was ascertained that the ball had entered near the spine, and that it had made a circuit either over the hip-bone or under the lower rib, and then lodged near the pit of the stomach under the breast; thence the ball was extracted by Mr. Guthrie without any difficulty, as it lay near the surface. It was at first thought that the wound was not of a dangerous character, as it did not appear that any vital part was injured; but Mr. Drummond shortly after became worse, and expired on the morning of the 25th. Even when a pulse could be felt nowhere, and a slight fluttering of the heart was alone perceptible, he retained the power of moving his limbs, pressed Mr. Guthrie's hand, and with that sweet smile on his countenance which was so endearing, asked if all hope was past? On Mr. Guthrie's replying that all hope in this world was over, and that he must put his trust in God, he said, "Well, I have endeavoured to live honestly, doing as much good as I could, and I place my hope in God's mercy for my redemption." Turning to his sister, whose self-devotion had been unequalled, and who was crying by his side, he said, "We have lived long and happily together, and my only regret is in parting with you." He then asked if he should live much longer, and on being told perhaps an hour or two, he said, "The sooner the better—I don't feel pain," and added, with a smile, "That ugly French word mal-aise expresses most fully my burthen." Shortly after he said, "Will it be presumptuous in a man in my situation to ask for a little wine and water, with soda or potash water," and on its being given to him, he conveyed it to his mouth, drank, and shortly expired. A coroner's inquest has returned a verdict of wilful murder against the assassin. The following is the report of the post mortem examination:—

"The body of the late E. Drummond, Esq., was opened by Mr. C. Gardiner Guthrie on Thursday, the 26th of January, at 1 o'clock, in the presence of Dr. Chambers, Dr. Hume, Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Bransby Cooper, and Mr. Jackson. The ball entered behind, two inches from the spinal process or ridge of the backbone, between the 11th and 12th rib, and three inches distant from the inferior angle of the shoulder-blade. It was extracted in front, between the cartilages of the 7th and 8th ribs, about ten inches distant from that part which is commonly called the pit of the stomach. The ball after entering the cavity of the chest slightly abraded the left lung at its lower and inferior edge, which part was covered by recent lymph, the lung being internally sound. The left side of the chest contained nearly a pint of red-coloured serum. The ball perforated the diaphragm, or muscular partition dividing the chest from the abdomen; it grazed the fat of the left kidney, and passed through the great omentum below the stomach, to the part where it was extracted, injuring no very important organ in the abdomen in its transit, but giving rise to an effusion of blood, which was found coagulated and diffused, to the amount of perhaps 12 ounces. The absence of all that shock and alarm which almost invariably follows the opening into either of the great cavities of the body, together with the great difficulty of ascertaining the spot at which the ball had entered, from its small size, gave rise, during the first 12 hours, to the anxious hope that it had not passed so directly across. We consider such a wound to be inevitably fatal.

"W. F. CHAMBERS. J. R. HUME. G. J. GUTHRIE. BARNES B. COOPER. RICHARD JACKSON."

Mr. Drummond has been buried at Charlton church, where lie the remains of the late Spencer Perceval.

The assassin, on being conveyed to Gardner's-lane police-station, gave his name as M'Naughten. He was then searched, and there were found on him two 5*l.* notes, 4*l.* in gold, and a deposit receipt of a Glasgow Bank for 750*l.*, made out in the name of "Daniel M'Naughten." His demeanour was cool and collected, nor did there appear any evidences of insanity. The policeman who apprehended him heard him say, on his being arrested, "He" or "she" (the policeman is uncertain which) "shall not disturb my mind any longer." The prisoner had been seen loitering about the public offices for some days previously. The 21st the prisoner was brought before Mr. Hall, at Bow-street, but the examination failed to throw any light upon the motives which actuated him in his attempt to assassinate Mr. Drummond. It merely exhibited the usual characteristics which distinguish this class of criminals—sullenness, occasionally wrought up into violence, recklessness of his own condition, and indifference as to the fate of his intended victim. He made the following statement:—"The Tories in my native city have compelled me to do this; they follow and persecute me wherever I go, and have entirely destroyed my peace of mind. They followed me to France, into Scotland, and all over England; in fact they follow me wherever I go; I can get no rest for them night or day. I cannot sleep at night, in consequence of the course they pursue towards me. I believe they have driven me into a conspiracy. I am sure I shall never be the man I formerly was. I used to have good health and strength, but I have not now. They have accused me of crimes of which I am not guilty; they have done every thing in their power to harass and persecute me, in fact they wish to murder me. It can be proved by evidence—that's all I wish to say at present." The Clerk.—"Is that all you wish to say?" Prisoner (hesitatingly).—"I can only say that they have completely disordered my mind, and I am not capable of doing anything compared to what I was. I am a very different man to what I was before they commenced this system of persecution." M'Naughten is known to be a native of Glasgow, where he has been considered a person of unsound mind. When at the Gardner's-lane police station an officer questioned him as to his knowledge of the party he had wounded, to whom the prisoner replied by stating, that he supposed it was Sir R. Peel. From this it is concluded that his intention was to murder the premier. A sergeant of the Glasgow police, who was sent for to see the prisoner, on arriving at Newgate recognized M'Naughten, with whom he has been acquainted from his earliest days down to 1839. During the whole of that period the officer speaks of him as a clever, shrewd person, but strongly imbued with Radical or Chartist principles; but, otherwise, he was a most estimable character. One rather curious circumstance connected with the melancholy event occurred during the Queen's visit to Scotland, but whether it has anything to do with the lamented death of Mr. Drummond is at present unknown. Upon the visit of Her Majesty, Sir R. Peel invariably rode in one of the royal carriages, while his private carriage was occupied on every public occasion by the deceased gentleman, who, from that circumstance, was taken for the Premier by the greater part of the spectators. It is stated that M'Naughten was very anxious to see the Premier while in Scotland, and Mr. Drummond was pointed out as Sir R. Peel; and this impression was further confirmed by seeing the deceased gentleman more than once leave the Premier's residences in Privy-Gardens. True bills for murder have been found against the prisoner, and his trial has been postponed to the next sessions of the Central Criminal Court.

Lord Morpeth's opinion on American slavery may be collected from the following extract of a letter from his Lordship to Mrs. Chapman, which appeared in the Liberty Bell, an annual, published at the Anti-Slavery Fair held in Boston, Dec. 1841:—"Your note has followed me across the Atlantic, reminding me, that when you once asked me, 'for the cause's sake,' to write a page or two for your annual publication of the Liberty Bell, I promised that 'I would think of it.' I now write to tell you that I have thought of it, and the result of my ripe reflection is a conviction, that for the 'cause's sake' it would be better for me to decline the honour of being one of your contributors. I say emphatically, 'for the cause's sake.' Since I had the pleasure of meeting you, all my personal observation of slavery has been made, and it has spread over a large surface. I have been present at debates on the subject in Congress. I have witnessed the working and effects of the institutions of the south and south-west of your republic, and in the island of Cuba. I have conversed with its friends, its enemies, and with neutrals, for such there are; I have met among planters and their families with persons not only of the most agreeable and refined intercourse, but of high honour, of real humanity, of deep and unaffected piety. Yet, so far from my views of the system having become modified, I should not feel myself precluded by any sentiments of delicacy, or even of gratitude, towards them, from giving the fullest and most public vent to my opinions or my feelings, if I could think that 'the cause' would thence derive the slightest benefit. The same grounds would induce me to concur in any answer which it might please you to put what I now address to you, even with the purpose of proving that I should be out of place among the regular ringers of the Liberty Bell. If a foreign chime should be detected in the peal of the Liberty Bell, I know not what startling echoes it might not awaken in the deepest recesses of America. There is a line which we happen to have often heard quoted among ourselves—

"Know ye not, 'Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow?' Now, strong as my opinion would be upon the supposition of a possible permanence of the present system, I should think him a bold man who could contemplate without shuddering the issue of a negro insurrection. The true application of the line in your case is this:—Who would make free, themselves must strike the blow; and, moreover, if the peculiar difficulties of the struggle seem to point exclusively to American efforts for their solution, so for American brows ought to be reserved the undivided laurel of the triumph. Though I may have chance to use the metaphor of war, yet it is plain, from the nature of the contest, from the relative number of the partisans, from the temper of the weapons employed, that if victory is to crown your exertions, it must be, as was the case in our own analogous, though less arduous achievement, a victory of argument, of reason, of patience, of conscience, of religion. Though I have forbidden to myself the meanest place in your ranks, I shall remain no indifferent spectator of the continuing conflict. The more obvious marks of public attention on either side of the sea may be diverted to other fields of action; you will dispute about Presidents, and we shall wrangle over tariffs. I am not underrating the importance which attaches to such considerations; but after having trod the confines of slavery,—after having traced our dark-coloured brethren in every condition, from the boy with the crescent mark of native royalty on his brow, just sold into eternal servitude upon the shore of Cuba, to the erect and disciplined recruit, who firmly treads the soil of Canada,—I feel that henceforth the main portion of my interest, hopes, and aspirations as to the course of public events in the world around me, must be directed to the sword march of human freedom. In that imposing cause the friends of the slave in the United States of North America appear to me to hold the most forward and critical position. May all your armory be worthy of the service in which it must be wielded—the gentleness that subdues, the discretion that guides without keeping back, the zeal that never cools, but never inflames! To say all, may you do the work of Heaven, with the spirit of Heaven, accompanied by the sympathies, the hopes, and the prayers of the Christian people of all nations; but relying alone on the Everlasting Arms beneath you, and your own good use of the means entrusted to your disposal!"—London Mail.

CENTRAL AMERICA.—A new work is about to be published at Philadelphia, which will throw additional light on the wonderful antiquities of Central America. It is from the pen of Mr. Norman, who has just returned from that region, having gone farther and examined more closely than any previous traveller. He describes the ruined city of Chi Cheu, among the stupendous monuments of which—temples, pyramids, houses, and palaces—he wandered for five days. The Indians regarded him with astonishment; but they had among them no tradition, no suspicion even, as to who were the people that inhabited that now silent city. There are the ruins of a temple 450 feet long—a pyramid 120 feet high—columns innumerable, strewn about or still standing, architecture vast and superb in its character and all in hewn stone, with ornaments and style resembling those of ancient Egypt, and now and then modern wild Indians. Norman says it must have been one of the largest cities in the world. Here, is indeed, a field for the Jonathan Oldbacks.—Correspondent of Chronicle.

CURE FOR HYDROPHOBIA.—At Udine, in Friule, a poor man lying under the frightful tortures of hydrophobia was cured with some draughts of vinegar given him by mistake instead of another potion. A physician at Padua got intelligence of this event at Udine, and tried the same remedy upon a patient at the hospital, administering to him a pound of vinegar in the morning, another at noon, and the third at sunset, and the man was speedily and perfectly cured.—Pat.

GAMBLING.—In the Court of Exchequer, on Saturday week, a gambling transaction formed the foundation of an action between a person named Smith, and one Bond, the keeper of a gaming-house. The game usually played was "French hazard;" and persons of rank were in the habit of staking large sums against the "bank" held by Bond; to whom reverted all the profits of the game: in one evening they amounted to 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* Considerable losses were sustained, on various occasions, by Mr. Bredell, Captain Courtney, Mr. Fitzroy Stanhope, the Marquis of Conyngham, Lord Cantalupo, and General Churchill. The action was brought under the Act of the 9th Anne, c. 14, to recover from Bond the sums alleged to have been unlawfully won. A verdict for the plaintiff was returned on five out of ten counts, with damages, including the triple value of 3,508*l.* the sum lost. Half the damages go to the parish. The Times suggests that this Act might be more effectually used against gaming-houses generally than the usual criminal process.—Ibid.

BLASPHEMOUS PUBLICATIONS.—Our readers will probably have noticed a police report, in which the son of one of the Vice-Chancellors was charged with having given way to a very natural impulse, in breaking the windows of a shop in which two blasphemous placards were shamelessly exhibited. The Magistrates inflicted no fine; but the gentleman paid the amount of the damage, and was congratulated on having done an act which would, probably, lead to a prosecution of the individual whose windows he had broken. This is all very well; but is it right that a foul and disgusting nuisance should be left unpunished, until a private individual, giving way to a very creditable feeling of irritation, proceeds to a lawless act, of which a breach of the peace might have been the consequence, and by which he might have become involved in a very serious dilemma? We do not think that the respectable part of the public should have no other protection against annoyance from blasphemous publications than to go about breaking windows, in order to attract the attention of the persons whose duty it is to put an end to the nuisance.—Globe.

THE RAILROADS.—The silent growth of this gigantic system, is a marvel among the marvels of our age. The three great lines that connect the Metropolis with the second commercial, and the first manufacturing capital of our Island, the London and Birmingham, Grand Junction, and Liverpool and Manchester Railways, have cost upwards of 9,500,000*l.* sterling, or more than 42,000*l.* per mile. Their joint receipts, for one twelvemonth ending in June last, were about 1,329,790*l.*; from which, after deducting the working expenses, more than 950,000*l.* remained to pay the interest of the loan creditors and the dividends of the proprietors. A royal income to be miserably managed by a few British merchants!—Pat.

FOREIGN MISCELLANEOUS.—About the middle of last month there was a grand ceremony at Venice, called the solemn inauguration of the railroad between Venice and Padua. The Patriarch, surrounded by all the first authorities, gave his benediction, and then delivered a very violent speech against such innovations as railroad travelling, which he thought would facilitate the introduction of books and liberal opinions!

From Constantinople we learn that Captain Williams, R. A., had been appointed by Sir S. Canning to proceed immediately to the Persian frontier to act as Commissioner, with those despatched by Persia and the Porte, and a Russian Colonel, named by M. de Boutenief, for the final arrangement of all existing difficulties. Redschid Pasha had been directed to return by Vienna to consult with Prince Metternich on the Servian question, on which no decision would be taken by the Porte until his arrival at Constantinople. The Austrian Ambassador had presented an angry note to the Divan, complaining of obstacles opposed to a commercial company trading with Trebisond. A change of Ministry was expected at Constantinople.

Since the late troubles in Servia the Austrian government has been occupied in concentrating two armies on its frontiers, the one in Transylvania, the other in Sirmia. This fact sufficiently indicates the fears with which Prince Metternich observes the growing influence of Russia over the Servian people, who are, for the most part, attached to Russian institutions and strongly opposed to those of Turkey. The majority of the Servians are of the Sclavonic race.

Letters from Athens state, that the King, instead of adopting a radical change of system, and curtailing his reckless expenditure, which alone could save the country from a national bankruptcy, had determined to keep his present incapable Ministry in office. There was not a para in the Treasury, and the revenue for the year 1842 had fallen short of that of the preceding year by nearly one-third.—London Mail.

The Ashantee Princes, who were educated with so much care under a clergyman in this country, selected by Sir F. Buxton, and sent to the Gold Coast, and thence to the capital of Ashantee, accompanied by Mr. Freeman, the Wesleyan missionary, have not realised the expectations of their friends. Previous to leaving Cape Coast Castle, the princes evinced certain propensities, even while under the roof of the Governor, which had brought them under his Excellency's most severe reproof. His admonitions, however, were soon forgotten, for on their arrival at Coomassie, Prince William Quantamissin inveigled the wife of one of the Ashantee chiefs into a criminal liaison, which, on being discovered, and the chief complaining to the king, the poor woman was taken to the door of the mission-house, where the prince was residing with Mr. Freeman, before whose eyes she was executed under circumstances of torture and barbarity too shocking to describe! Great apprehensions were entertained at Cape Coast Castle, when the last advices came away, that the affair would lead to an interruption of that good understanding between us and the King of Ashantee, which has so long subsisted.—Ibid.

FRANCE.—The King of the French opened the session of the French Chambers in person on the 9th January. The ceremony attracted a less crowd than usual out of doors; however, every precaution was taken to prevent "any accident" on the line of march from the Tuilleries: it was lined by troops and National Guards; the seven Royal carriages which bore the Monarch and his suite were preceded by a strong detachment of dragoons, surrounded by a numerous and brilliant staff, and followed by detachments of cavalry.

The King delivered his speech as follows:—"Gentlemen Peers and Deputies: The affection and the sympathy of the French nation have sustained my courage. My heart, ever suffering from grief, but full of confidence in your devotedness in calling you myself together to resume the course of your labours, I wished to conclude to-day what my grief had compelled me to leave incomplete at the opening of your session. You have already achieved much for the security and future prosperity of France; I thank you in her name. Whatever may be our trials, I and my family will devote to her service whatever strength and life the Almighty shall grant us. Thanks to the maintenance of public order and peace, the national prosperity, manifested itself beyond our most sanguine hopes. I feel confident that our prosperity will pursue its course without either interruption or obstacle. My relations with Foreign Powers continue to be pacific and amicable.

"The good harmony prevailing amongst the powers has strengthened the repose of the East, and procured in Syria for the Christian population the establishment of an administration conformable to their religious faith and their wishes. I deplore the disturbances which have recently agitated Spain. In my relations with the Spanish monarchy, my sole object has been to protect our legitimate interests, to preserve for Queen Isabella II. a faithful ally, and to testify for the rights of humanity that respect and protection which honour the name of France."

After referring to other subjects the King adds:—"Laws of Finance and various bills intended to introduce into our legislation and administration important improvements shall be immediately presented to you."

M. Lepelletier d'Aunay, a Conservative, but not the Ministerial candidate, was elected one of the four Vice-Presidents of the Chamber of Deputies, in place of Gen. Jacqueminot, by 178 votes; M. Vivien, the Thiers candidate, having only 115. Ministers withdrew their own candidates to give M. Lepelletier d'Aunay the better chance.

The Minister of Finance presented to the Chamber of Deputies on the 10th the budget for 1844, in which the expenditure was estimated at 1,281,000,000*fr.* The Minister of Commerce next laid on the table the Sugar Bill, of which he read the principal clauses. He said that the system of equalization of the duties on colonial and domestic sugar had been discussed in the Council, and found impracticable, and that it had ultimately decided on suppressing altogether the manufacture of domestic sugar, and granting an indemnity, to the parties interested; which sacrifice, he trusted would be repaid in a few years, by the increase in the proceeds of the duties on the colonial article.

The Ministry obtained a triumph over, not merely the Opposition, but over the Mote party, in the formation of the bureau, and the nomination of the commission of the Address. Only one member of opposition, M. Barrot, was appointed. All the others were of M. Guizot's opinions. The following were elected:—M. F. Real, Ministerial; M. Odillon Barrot; M. Dumon; M. Schauenberg; M. Bignon; M. Dupin; M. Debelloye; M. Hebert; M. Fautet. The committee discussed seriatim every paragraph of the Speech. M. Dupin declared himself against the right of search, and was of opinion that a paragraph ought to be added to the address analogous to the arrangement on the subject concluded by Great Britain with the United States. Although eight out of nine of the members of the Committee on the address were Ministerial, five of those nine declared themselves against the maintenance of the treaties of 1831 and of 1833. It was agreed to introduce an amendment in the reply relative to the right of search.

The debate in the Chamber of Peers turned upon the right of search, and the abrogation or maintenance of the treaties of 1831 & 1833; and the discussion was conducted with much heat. M. Guizot and M. Duchatel stood forward in defence of the treaties of 1831 and of 1833, and declared that they would execute them so long as the slave-trade should continue to exist, and that in furtherance of that resolve, they would renew the licences whenever they should expire. M. Cunin, Gridaine, and Teste (Ministers of Commerce and of Public Works) were less explicit, evincing a tendency to "trim;" but M. Lacaze Laplagne stated, that on entering into the present Cabinet, he stipulated that the treaty of 1841 should not be ratified, and added, that he should not be sorry to see a paragraph introduced into the address expressing a desire for the abrogation of the treaties of 1831 and 1833.

M. Guizot said the Treaty was there, and could not be broken by sophism. He admitted the general feeling against the Right of Search. He was bound to respect and take it into account, but he could not sacrifice to it, however strong, the true interests of the country. What were the facts? The French had not only signed the Treaties themselves, but had induced Spain, Portugal, Tuscany, the Hanse Towns, and a host of small states, to join it. One motive of doing so was to prevent England from having the exclusive Right of Search. How could France now withdraw herself, and leave these small naval states to the sole search of England? The treaties had been efficacious, for the slave trade which existed in French vessels in 1830 had ceased for them; at the same time the inconveniences of the Treaty had been exaggerated. In ten years there had been twelve complaints, seven of which were found groundless. Satisfaction had been given for two, and three remained in suspense. Then occurred the Treaty of July, 1840, from which had sprung exasperation; and exasperation fastened on the Right of Search as a gravamen. The Right of Search was denounced. How get rid of it? By eluding the Treaties? No; this was mean and dishonest. As long as they existed they should be executed. Some proposed to open negotiations with England to get them modified; but, in the present state of irritation on the question on both sides of the Channel, how could a good result be attained? Were the question merely between Cabinets it might be arranged. But the public, and the press, and Parliament on both sides, had and would take up the question, which thus became impossible to solve. He had tried last year to get the Treaty of 1841 modified, but the English Minister refused, saying that, after the menacing and angry arguments made use of in the French Chambers, the dignity of England would be compromised if she yielded to such turbulence. As for me, exclaimed M. Guizot, I will not negotiate. Negotiation could only lead to a refusal on the part of England, which should either submit to or resent. The one would be weakness, the other folly. I will lend myself to neither.

Duc de Broglie showed what was the state of things previous to the revolution of July. Under the government of Louis XVIII. and Charles X. hosts of French vessels were engaged in the slave trade. The English in vain demanded the right of reciprocal search. The French denied it. But the English searched all the same, stopped, and seized, and condemned slave-traders under the French flag down to the very month after the revolution of 1830. We did but regulate a right and a custom existing de facto, said the Duc de Broglie; and we must either have done this or broken with the only power that showed itself friendly to our revolution.

After the Duc de Broglie had returned to his seat, no one asking to speak on the amendment, it was put to the vote, and the numbers were declared to be—For the Address, 118; for the Amendment, 67. Majority in favour of Ministers, 51.

SPAIN.—The following decree for the dissolution of the Cortes appeared on the 4th Jan.—“As Regent of the kingdom during the minority of Queen Isabel II., and in her royal name, &c., I decree,—First, the Chamber of Deputies is dissolved. Secondly, the third of the Senate will be renewed according to article 19 of the constitution. Thirdly, the new Cortes are convoked at Madrid for the 3rd of April.—Duque de la Vittoria.” On the 1st Jan. the Regent entered the capital on horseback, accompanied by the civil and military authorities, who had gone out to meet him. The cortege was numerous, and the état-major extremely brilliant. The reception of Espartero by the people was cold, and little or no enthusiasm was manifested by the troops or national guards.

The Pharos des Pyrénées states that the Council of War sitting at Pampeluna had condemned to death under the presidency of General Goui, an ancient Carlist chief, 180 persons, alleged to have taken part in the events of October, 1841. The name of Genl O'Donnell figures at the head of the list.

The speech delivered by the King of the French, on opening the Chambers, did not produce a satisfactory impression in Madrid. Reports of a change in the Spanish Ministry have been afloat. The Correspondant states that M. Capaz was the only member of the present Administration likely to retain office. According to El Sol, the new Ministry would be composed as follows:—Messrs. Francisco Lujan, Minister of the Interior; Landero, of Justice; Pedro Chacon, of War; Capaz, of the Navy; Rodriguez Real, of the Finances; and Jose Maria Calatrava, of Foreign Affairs and President of the Council.

Accounts from Barcelona state that the Captain-General had relaxed several of the severe orders issued by Van Halen. The payments on the forced contribution go on very slowly; the Captain-General had extended the period for the payment.—London Mail.

Under instructions from the Right Honourable the Governor General of India, and in anticipation of the orders of the Honourable the President in Council, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is directed to direct the following arrangements to be adopted for breaking up, from the 1st proximo, the volunteer Regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel G. W. A. Lloyd, raised for service in China.

Transfer rolls of the Native Officers and men, according to a form to be supplied from the Adjutant General's office, to be prepared and forwarded to the Adjutant General of the army, on receipt of which an abstract will be published in General Orders, showing the number and description of persons transferred to the several corps of Native Infantry.

The men of the volunteer Regiment, who are now absent at their homes, on medical certificates, and to whom references on the subject cannot be made, are to be entered in the transfer rolls as having chosen to return to the corps from which they originally volunteered.

Correct descriptive rolls of the Native Officers and men, including the date of enlistment and of promotion to the several ranks, with a General Certificate of the date to which they have received their pay and clothing, the period of leave granted to them, and all other necessary information, to be transmitted by the officer commanding the volunteer battalion, to the commanding officers of the Regiments to which the volunteers shall be transferred.

Each individual is also to be furnished with the prescribed pay and clothing certificates; and the men are to be informed, that if they do not join the corps to which they are transferred, at the expiration of their leave, they will be struck off the strength of it unless they shall be able to assign a satisfactory reason for their protracted absence.

The Native officers and men transferred, are to take rank in the corps to which they are allotted agreeably to their standing in the service; and the juniors of each rank in excess to the establishment of regiments, are to be returned as "superannuaries," until vacancies shall occur for bringing them on the strength.

The records of the battalion, with descriptive lists of the books and papers, are to be forwarded to the office of the Adjutant General of the army in Calcutta; the arms, accoutrements, colours, camp equipage, and all other public stores and property, now with the corps, are to be sent to the arsenal of Fort William, after being minutely surveyed by a committee, appointed by the commanding officer at Barrackpore, the proceedings of which are to be transmitted to the Military Board.

At a General Court Martial assembled at Benares, on Monday the 16th day of January 1843, Captain Kenneth Campbell, of the 45th Regiment Native Infantry, placed in arrest by order of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, was arraigned on the following charge:
Charge.—For conduct highly unbecoming the character of an officer, in having addressed a public letter to Lieutenant Alexander Brown, Acting Adjutant of the Regiment, dated Jaunpur, 12th November 1842, containing most disrespectful and contumacious observations on the opinions and orders of his superior officer, Colonel Charles Murray Skerston, commanding the 45th Regiment Native Infantry.

Finding.—The Court find the prisoner Captain Kenneth Campbell, of the 45th Regiment Native Infantry, guilty of the charge preferred against him, with exception of the words "and contumacious," of which they acquit him.
Sentence.—The Court, having found the prisoner guilty, to the extent above recorded, do sentence him, Captain Kenneth Campbell, of the 45th Regiment Native Infantry, to be severely reprimanded, in such manner as His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief may be pleased to direct.

Retired finding and sentence.—The Court, having reconsidered their finding and sentence, beg, with every deference to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, to adhere to the same.

Confirmed.
(Signed) J. NICOLLS, Genl. and Commander-in-Chief.

22d February, 1843.

REMARKS BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

The Commander-in-Chief's opinion on this case being much at variance with the finding of the Court, which acquitted the prisoner of using contumacious observations, His Excellency must again express his disapprobation of that part of their verdict.

Captain Campbell officially, in writing, calls his commanding officer's remarks "extraordinary opinions," he says also, to the Adjutant, "I will not take the trouble of showing how untenable this opinion is;" again, "the last paragraph of your letter was not required."

No officer who has served 21 months (not 21 years) in this or any army, should be ignorant of the extreme disrespect with which a Captain Campbell dared, in those expressions, to treat his commanding officer.

The excuse offered in his defence, are, that he wrote in a moment of irritation, and that he would have withdrawn the offensive letter had opportunity been given to him. The Commander-in-Chief cannot accept either. Irritation with senior officers, on duty, is indefensible, and to write impertinent letters in the chance of being allowed to retract, equally so.

Upon the second excuse too, His Excellency must further remark, that when an opportunity of retracting was permitted (in his defence) Captain Campbell, so far from withdrawing, or explaining away what was offensive, has, in several places, supported his error; "his opinions," he says, "were consistent with honest retort in self defence."

No army can stand if all are allowed to feel and act in this way, and this unilitary expression is most highly censured.

The reprimand, which His Excellency desires to convey in the above remarks, having been read to Captain Campbell by the officer commanding at Benares, at his quarters, Captain Campbell is to be released, and to return to his duty.

intercourse of the Chinese and the English. The latter feared about the country in search of game up to the very walls of Ningpo in perfect security. The feelings of the people, patriotic as well as plebeian, in the neighbourhood of Canton, are however characterised by a deadly hostility. At the head of the anti-British party are the gentry and the men of Letters. They have formed themselves into a "Society of spirit and loyalty," the object of which is to exterminate the English. They have placed their services at the disposal of the Commissioner, and entreated his permission to exhibit their loyalty by our destruction. The Commissioner thus alludes to this circumstance in his Proclamation of the 25th January:

"The High Commissioner, has further heard a rumor, that the Gentry and Scholars of the country around Canton, acting still under the name of raising a patriot band of soldiers, to avenge this quarrel, have formed a 'Society of Spirit and Loyalty.' And sundry of these gentry and scholars, have recently presented themselves before the High Commissioner, to make a surrender of their services for purposes of war. These things are done, indeed, under the momentary impulse of a burst of loyalty and patriotism. But they are in direct opposition to the sacred purpose of our August Sovereign, tenderly to cherish men from afar, and well-entreat those who yield him obedience, and not less opposed to His gracious pleasure, that hostilities should cease and commerce be renewed."

It is difficult to account for the growth of such a feeling among those who have had the longest experience of our character, and have reaped the largest profits from our commerce, while those in the north who know us only as the conquerors who have humbled the Celestial dynasty, welcome our residence among them with joy. The natural effect of this feeling at Canton will be to build up the prosperity of Hong Kong on the ruins of the old imperial port.

The opium trade in the North appears to have received the strongest impulse from the success of our arms, and the establishment of our authority in Chusan and Amoy. It was selling at very high prices; eight vessels laden with it were lying near Chusan, and the inhabitants of the Coast seem to have had a spell of Opium, such as they have never enjoyed before. We hear nothing of any attempt of the Chinese preventive service to seize the forbidden drug. The fear of breaking with us, has apparently paralyzed the officers of the Empire. The subject will be brought forward shrewdly at the ensuing conference between Bishop and Sir Henry Pottinger; and the latter will urge the propriety of legalizing the trade, and making it contribute to the Imperial treasury. This would doubtless be the wisest course the Emperor could pursue,—only it is hard for an eastern potentate, and hardly still for one of the Tartar Dynasty, to be obliged to sign his own words. The Chinese Government cannot physically prevent the introduction of a drug, through so long a line of coast, for which the people have so irremediable a longing. If the trade continues to be regarded as contraband, it must sooner or later lead to another rupture with us. The Emperor on this occasion would find it his wisest policy to bend to circumstances, and to fix a duty on an article which no power, Chinese or foreign, can keep out of the Empire.

PROGRESS AND PROSPECTS OF PROTESTANTISM.—To gratify the wishes expressed by many of our readers, we have searched the papers brought by the last Mail, for facts relative to the progress of Protestantism during the last month or two, and now present them with the result of our researches.

The Roman Catholics have to boast of one more convert to their creed, from among those who have advanced half way towards them. The Rev. Bernard Smith, Rector of Leadenham in Lincolnshire, has given up a living worth 700*l.* a year, and as the Roman Catholic papers state, "has been received into the bosom of the Catholic Church. He has generously sacrificed the emoluments of his rectory, in the hope of exchanging them for an eternal inheritance." This completes the number of converts to Ten, viz.

1. Rev. R. W. Sibthorp, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford.
2. Rev. Bernard Smith, late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford.
3. Edward Douglas, Esq., B. A. Gentleman Communion of Christ Church.
4. Peter le Page Remond, Esq., Scholar of Pembroke College, Oxford.
5. Johnson Grant, Esq., Communion of St. John's College, Oxford.
6. Rev. Mr. Wakerbath.
7. A Tradesman of Oxford.
8. A boy at Shrewsbury School.
9. Miss Gladstone.
10. Miss Young.

This list of actual accessions, however, gives but an inadequate idea of the progress of these opinions in the bosom of the Protestant Church.

The inevitable tendency of these doctrines is to a union with Rome. Those who have relinquished the fundamental doctrines of Protestantism, and have begun to regard with complacency the doctrines of the Romish creed, will soon find that there is no halting between two opinions. The great organ of the Tractarian party, the British Critic, in an article recently published in the fifty-ninth number of that work has the following ominous expression:—"We cannot stand where we are; we must go backwards or forwards; and it will surely be the latter;" and the increasing anxiety of the Oxford school to repudiate whatever distinguishes Protestantism from Romanism, shews but too plainly that they cannot stand still, and are advancing at a rapid pace to Rome. It was said to have been the chief object of Number 90 to prevent a large defection from the Protestant Church of England, by shewing how much of Roman Catholic doctrine might be professed by those who still continued to receive Protestant pay; but it is much to be doubted whether the Church of England does not gain much more by the open departure of such men as Sibthorp and Smith, than by the continuance in its ranks of those who are spreading the poison of their doctrines unchecked through the land, and endeavouring more especially to distill it into the minds of youth. It is said that an Italian priest, who recently visited Oxford, expressed his strong satisfaction at the progress which Romanism was making at that seat of learning. Indeed the Catholics who have for some time past established an additional weekly service for the conversion of England to Popery, consider the present movement in the light of "an answer to prayer." We believe nothing could be more foreign to their wishes than that Dr. Pusey and Mr. Newman should quit the advantageous position they now occupy, in which they so admirably subvert the cause of Romanism, to officiate with Mr. Sibthorp at St. Chad's Cathedral in Birmingham.

This movement towards Rome does not appear to have met with any efficient check from the Bishops; and it will soon become too strong for the Bishops to check. It is true, that some of them have denounced Tractarian doctrine in their charges with great seal and alacrity, but the effect of these censures has been neutralized by the mild and faint admonitions of other Bishops. There is not a single member of the Bench who has had the courage, as far as we have heard, to step in favour of the reformed doctrine; to take up his stand upon Protestant ground, and boldly suspend the Minister who is endeavouring to lead his flock towards Rome. On the contrary, where the Bishops have acted, it appears to have been on the wrong side of the question. At some private meeting of the Clergy in the diocese of Exeter, the Rev. Mr. Babb said, that such was his opinion of the Puseyite doctrines preached by a certain clergyman, who appears to have been the Rev. Mr. Lenney, that he should feel it his duty if he knew any of his flock attend the ministry of that gentleman, to warn them of its dangerous tendency. This led to a correspondence, which was handed up to the Right Reverend Dr. Phillips; and Mr. Lenney was appointed a canon of Exeter Cathedral; and Mr. Babb deprived of his license to preach. On the other hand, the assertion of a Protestant clergyman on Christmas-day to his flock that "the body of Christ had been as absolutely upon the altar table of the communion as it appeared to the shepherds," passed without the slightest rebuke from the Diocesan.

"It would be impossible in the small space we can allot to the subject to give any thing like an adequate report of the various circumstances which indicate the strength and tendency of the present movement. All other differences in the Church of England seem to be lost in the abounding strife of the two parties into which it is divided, viz. of those who are anxious to efface every emblem of Protestantism, and to assimilate the Church in its doctrine and ritual to Rome, and those who contend for the Reformation. The question of preaching in a surplice or in an ascensional gown, in itself a matter of indifference, has been brought into the arena, because the gown is supposed to be the badge of the Reformation. The Bishop of London tried to steer a middle course between the Scylla and Charybdis of black and white vestments, and gave permission to wear the surplice one part of the day, and the gown the other. The surplice has carried the day, and the Tractarians have triumphed. The Sermons delivered by the London Clergy have now all the advantage of that superior union which a white garment can impart to them, and the garb of Protestantism is seen chiefly on the back of the unfortunate curate who has no "pastoral relation," with the people. The Rector or Vicar preaches in the surplice, the poor curate in his gown. Again, the crusade against pews has grown chiefly out of the fact that pews date from the Reformation. Away then with them from the Churches. The good Bishop of Norwich has given his sanction to the anti-Puseyite movement, as it has been facetiously termed, from the best of motives, because he thinks they serve to diminish the number of sittings in the Church. But the attack on pews is a Tractarian movement. The same objection is started against galleries. A gallery is intended solely for the accommodation of those who come to listen to a sermon. It is therefore a nuisance in a Church, and an assimilation is a Choir. The wishes of the party well summed up by its organ, the British

Critic, are—

On the following words. It is probable that some of the Puritans may not yet be prepared to go the whole length of the Cities, but judging from the ratio of their past progress, there is little reason to doubt that a very short period will be sufficient to carry them, perhaps ahead of this journal.

"We repeat, then, that we would rather see, on entering a church, nothing but the altar and its ornaments; the ministering priests and deacons; the pulpit, and whatever else is necessary; the raised floor and the worshippers or hearers thereon. There is a power and a tenderness in that floor, which is lost if it be hidden. It teaches deep humility, unyielding constancy, unswerving patience, changeless perpetuity. The worshipper should throw himself upon it, Harpos in as if it were the floor beneath the footstool of his heavenly Father, by contact with which he every time derives new strength and power. There is a virtue, by the same rule that there is a natural law, in falling down on the very ground—the very lowest place that can be got at—when in the act of confession and supplication. Hence it is that galleries are absurd and impossible as places of devotion."

Numerous are the incidents continually presented to view, which, however trifling in themselves, serve to indicate the course of the current. Thus, we find it stated that the Roman Catholic lawyers have delivered it as their opinion, that a man may by law hold a Protestant living, while he professes the doctrines of Romanism.—At a parish in Essex, where the incumbent is said to be "a silly specimen of the Newman School," some of his parishioners resented to a neighbouring parish for the Sacrament. The clergyman was forbidden by his Bishop to administer it.—The "Churchman's Almanac" has been enlarged with a view to accustom the mind to the Romish ritual.—At a meeting of the clergy in the Archbishopric of Ely to petition her Majesty against the annexation of the see of Ample to that of Bangor, six of the Clergymen moved that the term Protestant and Reformed, as applied to the Church of England, should be omitted. Even the Tracts for the Times allow that the Church of England is Reformed, and only deny her the claim of being Protestant.

We have already trespassed more perhaps than we ought to have done on the patience of our readers; and we would only ask their attention for one moment more to the following extract from the Edinburgh Review received by the Hindostan, which describes the effect of the movement on the University of Oxford.

"The influence of the principles thus excited on the moral character is bad enough; but on intellectual progress it is disastrous. The fruits of the recent fashion of decrying mere scientific pursuits, or more literary studies as unworthy, frivolous, or dangerous, are terribly apparent in the present condition of Oxford. Here, at least, we shall scarcely meet with a contradiction. The gradual destruction of the lecture-rooms, in which knowledge not absolutely connected with University discipline, is imparted, is notorious. The utter absence of all spirit for investigation of every sort, except in polemic theology and one or two inferior pursuits of taste, in the subject, even there, of general lamentation. Natural philosophy, indeed, while regarded by all, is also justly disesteemed by many, from similar reasons to that which the late King of Naples was wont to give for refusing grants of money to the Herculaneum excavations; namely, that something might be discovered thereby which would overturn the Christian religion, and thus his Majesty would never get education. Historical study seems altogether at an end, except in the single province of ecclesiastical antiquities; indeed, as we have seen it is ingeniously remarked by a writer of the Oxford school, all history is dangerous, and ought to be rewritten on Church principles. Nay, the very special studies of antiquaries are no longer pursued with the spirit and zeal of former times; classical scholarship is declining. We saw it stated the other day, in a journal favourable to the present 'movement,' that the art of prose Latin compositions is absolutely lost at Oxford. To borrow again the forcible language of Dr. Arnold, 'The two great parties of the Christian world have each their own standard of truth, by which they try all things—Scripture on the one hand; the voice of the Church on the other. To both, therefore, the pure intellectual movement is not only unwelcome, but they dislike it. It will question what they will not allow to be questioned; it may arrive at conclusions which they would regard as impious. And, therefore, in an age (we mean,) of religious 'movement,' particularly, the spirit of intellectual movement soon finds itself proscribed rather than countenanced.'

"Thus much, at least, is matter of general observation, that while the loss is certain, the gain in higher respects is worse than questionable; that such much has been lost, along with knowledge itself, of the habits of mind which attend an ardent pursuit of knowledge—of manly candour, of extended sympathies, of that generous frank enthusiasm, so graceful in the young; that a captious, close, exclusive spirit, is apt to grow on the mind, under the discipline and associations now prevailing—producing in vigorous natures a concentrated heart, instead of an expansive warmth; this is complained of, we know not how justly, but seems to follow as a not unnatural consequence. For this, and much more, Oxford has to thank the peculiar exertions of the ablest and most active among the present teachers, and the success which has attended them."

THIS NINGPO BELL AND THE NEW CATHEDRAL.—The following correspondence is published in the Intelligencer.

To the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, &c. &c. &c.
MY LORD,—I have brought from Ningpo in China, a most handsome Iron Bell for our New Cathedral of Calcutta, of which I beg your acceptance.
It has a very fine tone and is valuable from its antiquity, and as a specimen of large casting is fine, so well for the beauty.

The Archbishop, Mr. Doolittle, has kindly taken charge of it until your arrival, and delivers it much.

I have the honor to be,
My Lord,
Your very faithful servant,
(Sd.) W. WARDEN,
Canon, &c. &c. &c. R. M. House, Fort Street, Calcutta, Feb. 21st 1848.
No. 43, Park Street, Chancery.

EXPLY TO THE ABOVE.
Calcutta, Feb. 18, 1848.
DEAR SIR,—I have received with the greatest pleasure the account of the Bell which you have brought from Ningpo, and which you are so good as to present to me for the New Cathedral. I trust it is a token that the Mission, Doctrine, and Labors, of the true Religion will ultimately spread forth the voice of the Gospel, sustained by the fine toned Bell you have given me, from Calcutta, India, and thus return to its spiritual birth, the beautiful one it has bestowed upon the Christian Cathedral of the East.

I am,
Dear Sir, with much gratitude,
Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) D. GALEY.

We venture to offer one or two considerations against the employment of this Bell in the service of the Cathedral Church of Calcutta. In the first place, Capt. Warden's right to make such an offering is very questionable. He was engaged in a warlike expedition, under the authority of the crown of England, and the right to all prize property captured in such an expedition is vested exclusively in the Crown. Whatever may fall into the hands of the victors, ought by right to be made over to the Prince Agent and disposed of according as his Majesty may direct in his Royal Warrant.

This bell Captain Warden has no more substantive title than Sir John Kean had to Hyder Khan's sword, which he was obliged to resign, and which the officers of the Bombay Service subsequently purchased and presented to him. The act of presenting this article of plunder establishes the fact, that Capt. Warden, was at the time forgetful of his obligations, and the acceptance of it would look like a recognition by the highest authority of an irregular act in a public servant.

In the next place, supposing this objection removed, still the circumstances under which the Bell was acquired render its employment in a Christian Church a matter of questionable propriety. It was obtained in a war which has more of an aggressive than of a defensive character. It was acquired amidst the havoc we made among the peaceable inhabitants of Ningpo, who had never done us any injury. The venerable Bishop, always enthusiastic upon every thing connected with his beloved Cathedral,—as he styles the edifice in a letter we have quoted elsewhere—expresses a hope that the Bell when placed in St. Paul's will sound to Ningpo and announce the blessed tidings of the Gospel. If the sound should ever reach that city, it can only serve to awaken in the minds of its heathen inhabitants the remembrance of an invasion, which brought desolation among them; and for any advantage it may do the cause of Christianity, its tongue had far better remain far ever silent. It will convey no sweet accents of Christian charity to the ears of those whose male relatives were swept away by our troops, and whose female connections were struggled to avoid, as they erroneously supposed, the violence of our soldiery. If the Bell had been presented by those who had spared Heathenism and embraced the Christian faith, there would have been much propriety in attaching it to a Christian edifice. As a trophy of Christianity it would form an appropriate appendage for the belfry; as a trophy of war, its more appropriate place, in our humble apprehension, is the Museum.

EDUCATION AT THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY.—We have been favoured with an analysis of the last Report of the Board of Education at Bombay, by a Correspondent who takes a deep interest in the progress of instruction among the Natives of this country, and placed it among our correspondence. Bombay is the only Presidency at which Schools which may be strictly denominated Vernacular have been established at the public expense. The experiment has succeeded in a considerable degree; but there is large room for improvement in every department of labour. The number of books provided for the use of the Schools, considering both the period they have been established—sixteen years—and the facilities which exist for making translations, by the well educated natives of Bombay, appears to be very scanty. The superintendence bestowed upon the Schools, though much improved of late, by no means corresponds with their importance. Hence except in two or three instances, they appear to be in a languid state, and, generally speaking, have not produced those large results which might have been expected, and which, with more attention, might reasonably be calculated on. The comparatively small interest manifested in these Schools by the public Officers, has a natural tendency to discourage the people themselves, and to render them indifferent to the im-improvement of their children. The want of direct and visible connection between proficiency in the School room and success in the public service, is also an obstacle to the progress of these schools, and this the Report pointedly alludes to. The tender plant of education needs this fostering care while yet young; when it has attained greater maturity, as in our own land, no such direct patronage from the state will be necessary; the tree will need no watering. It is very much to be desired that the Vernacular system of education which has been adopted under the Bombay Presidency should be carried to greater perfection. The organization and machinery are already in existence, they only need improvement. In this respect Bombay is far in advance of Bengal where Government has not adopted a school which can strictly be called Vernacular. To Bombay therefore we must look to furnish a model for indigenous instruction throughout the country.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30.

— The Star has obtained a copy of the Bombay Gazette of the 30th January, which indignantly repels the charges made by the English papers of the barbaric committed on the bodies of those who were wrecked from the Caquero. The Editor acknowledges that the conduct of the wreckers was very objectionable; but affirms that there is not the slightest foundation for the charge that any of the bodies with a spark of life in them was stripped and cast back into the sea. A very circumstantial detail is given of the clothing in which the bodies were found. These statements, which appear worthy of all confidence, must tend to relieve the agonized feelings of those who in this heavy burthen have been led to think that the hand of man has been more fatal to their friends than even the tempest?

— The Landholder's Society is determined to prove that it is awake. It seems to have derived some strength from the refreshing sleep of two months which it has enjoyed. A numerous meeting was held on the 28th of March. During its state of somnolence, the Sale law has come into operation and has proved, on unvaried testimony, a signal blessing to the country. The Landholder's Society are anxious to destroy what Lord Castlereagh would have called one of the "fundamental features" of the Act. They wish special notice to be given to the parties of the sale of estates for arrears. Why? Is information or delay? For information it cannot be. All delay for interest and penalty have been abolished. Every man knows to a penny how he is to pay, and to a minute when he is to pay it; why then should he incur the penalty?

— The Court of Directors, as we learn from the Register, have sanctioned the erection of an Immense Hospital for natives on the plan contemplated by Lord Auckland.

— The last Mail has brought many assurances, conveyed in different letters, that the Marquis of Tweeddale is not to succeed Lord Ellenborough as Governor General. It is said that the Duke has been struggling hard for his friend; but that he is not likely to succeed. Sir Charles Metcalfe is confidently spoken of as Lord Ellenborough's successor; but unless his Lordship should receive information of his having lost the confidence of his friends in the Ministry, he may remain till the year 1867, after which Sir Charles would be too old for the office.

— Among other notions of brother Jonathan is that of adorning the City of Palaces with American furniture. A large investment has been just sent out; and is said by those who have seen it to be elegant, if not magnificent, especially the rocking chairs.

FRIDAY, MARCH 31.

— The papers of this day are to a remarkable degree barren of all local intelligence. The Age / Observer gives us a long account of the investiture of the two Generals with the order of the Bath; but this we had before. The only additional circumstance in the narrative is the fact that a flag of Akbar Khan's, which a trooper of the 1st Cavalry had taken, was presented to Lord Ellenborough, who called for his Commanding officer, Major Crommelin, and sending for the trooper delivered the flag to him after a short speech.

— The Star takes occasion, from a reference to the Cabot relief fund, to allude to the donation of 5000 Rs. which Lord Auckland sent to it from England, in a manner so unostentatious, that it was discovered in this country only by accident. (Our contemporary then refers to the remarkable circumstance that our present Governor General has invariably refused his assistance, publicly at least, to all our public charities. The monthly donation of 500 Rs. to the District Charitable Society, which originated with Lord William Bentinck and was kept up by Sir Charles Metcalfe and Lord Auckland, has been discontinued since Lord Ellenborough assumed the Governor-Generalship. We have no doubt that his Lordship's charities are as great as they are unostentatious, and that they are dictated on the Christian principle of not allowing the left hand to know what the right hand does; but a Governor General is placed in a peculiar position; his charities serve as a stimulus to others; and ought not therefore to be concealed under a bushel.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1.

— The Delhi Gazette last received, gives information from Hyderabad to the 11th of March, when an attack had been made on Sir Charles Napier's position. Coal had been sent on from Bombay by the Steamers which had been unable to move for want of fuel, the passengers having carried off all the wood which had been collected on the banks of the river. It is said to be the General's intention to move against Meerpoor in the direction of Unrotra, where the Baluchos had assembled an army—as soon as he received re-inforcements. The ruffian who so barbarously murdered Capt. Ennis had been hung without ceremony. Every act of similar atrocity will meet with cordial and instant punishment under Sir Charles' administration and the lives of British officers and soldiers will thus be preserved.

— The arrival of the hot, dry, parching season has as usual, been marked in Calcutta by almost daily fire. The act passed some two or three years ago against the construction of houses with combustible materials, has been constantly evaded with perfect impunity; and the town will therefore, we may expect, be burnt down once every five years. The establishment of fire engines is evidently insufficient, and those belonging to the town will not be able to extinguish fire beyond the boundary; this is said to have been ordained by way of retaliation!

— The Bombay Times has a long article on the subject of Soinde, which were it shorter we should be able to publish. Our contemporary tells us, that the devotion of the people to the cause of the country is so great, that six hundred men belonging to a single tribe were brought to the battle of Monsoon on the 17th of February, of whom only twelve, all more or less wounded, survived the action. He also informs us that we cannot now recede; that repugnance must stop short of restitution, and that we must retain the territory to prevent worse befalling us; but that we must be prepared to pay the sum of three millions Sterling, during the next ten years for the restitution of Soinde; that the expense will be seventy lakhs of Rupees a year, while the revenue is only forty lakhs; so that the annual deficit will be thirty lakhs. But does he actually suggest how much the Presidency of Bombay will gain, by the restoration of its Civil Service, the increase of its army and that monopoly of the trade which its merchants will enjoy? He seems to hover between the injustice and cost of the acquisition; and the benefit it will confer on his own Presidency. On the whole, his complacency appears to be prejudiced by a trifling, over his hatred of territorial aggrandizement. The soil, says he, is rich alluvium, and if the advantages of nature were seconded by human skill, the resources of the country would be inexhaustible. This may be expected to be the case when it is united to a Presidency, which contains so much spirit and enterprise, and then the account will probably stand thus. Rupees, seventy lakhs; losses, one crore; clear annual surplus, thirty lakhs; clear surplus in ten years, three millions sterling. Bombay alone will gain by her new occupation.—We must retain it; we cannot recede; we must give up the idea not only of restitution, but of repugnance.

— The number of letters and covers received from England by the last overland mail, appears to exceed that of all former mails; the letters amounted to 20,420; the papers to 27,087; in all 56,507. More than three hundred thousand English newspapers subscribed for in India in the course of a twelvemonth!

— The Bombay community has done itself honour, by taking steps for raising a subscription to present a sword to Major Outram, is chamber and power as regards.

SUNDAY, APRIL 3.

— The Bombay Gentlemen's Gazette is almost certain that the whole of the prize money obtained at Hyderabad will be given to the army. Now of this nothing certain can by any manner of means be known in this country. Every thing depends upon her Majesty's pleasure, or rather upon the pleasure of her Majesty's advisers. If the prize money be not of great amount, doubtless there will be no objection to its being distributed among the officers of the army.

— Lord Ellenborough has paid a visit to the Principal Sudder Ameen's Court and is intended to visit other public offices. Lord William Bentinck never allowed his intention to visit the public offices to transpire; and he afforded the officers no opportunity of putting the "house in order."

— The Register has given us a statement of the papers received daily from Bombay after the arrival of the last Steamer.

Now, if these papers and letters had been sent by the Hindustan they would all have been delivered on the 24th of March. We should then have had to pay in all about 1000 Rs. for our letters and 300 Rs. for our newspapers. For the privilege of receiving them through Bombay, during our successive days, we paid 5000 Rs. for our letters and 300 Rs. for our newspapers.

TUESDAY, APRIL 4.

— The following mysterious announcement appears in the Calcutta Star of this morning. "We hear that an affair which has lately excited some attention, has been noticed by Government, and that an official concerned has been called on to explain."

— Intelligence has been received from China to the 25th, for which we refer to our editorial remarks in extracts. The news will bring on the account of the execution of a party of the 94th Regiment at Manila. The example may have been necessary, but the arrangements were more worthy of savages than of a people to in the Eastern languages, have, therefore, from time to time obtained him such appointments as come within the range of Officers of the Royal Service. He was accordingly appointed to the Staff of the 1st Division, and was, through the whole of the war he was appointed Adjutant of the King's Depot at Chinnai; and on the abolition of that short-lived establishment, rejoined the 10th, from which he was from time to time detached to act as an Interpreter at various courts, until the deficiency of the regiment becoming vacant in 1841, he was nominated to fill that office, which he held to the period of his retirement in 1850. During the first Afghan campaign he served on the Staff of Sir W. Cotton, and resumed with that Officer to the British provinces when it was considered over. His Military career, however, quickened by a promulgation of "more stirring times," which his knowledge of Afghan affairs rendered him led him to anticipate, soon turned him back again towards Calcutta. Accordingly he accompanied Brigadier Shabul's brigade, in command of a detachment of recruits, and was soon after appointed to the Staff of General Elphinstone, Sir W. Cotton's successor. He accompanied the detachment being sent out "to clear the road between Cabul and Jellalabad," in October, 1841. Capt. Havlock remained, performing his duties as Adjutant. The services rendered, during the many days of almost unintermitted fighting which marked the progress of the little hand to Jellalabad, have been acknowledged by the British Government despatches describing the operations; and similar acknowledgments were subsequently put forth relative to his services during the siege. On the 7th April, 1842, Capt. Havlock dominated the end of the columns of attack in the memorable engagement with Akbar Khan before Jellalabad. With reference to his conduct on that occasion, Sir Robert Sale's despatch speaks thus:—"The able and judicious manner in which Capt. Havlock moved the force under his command, which acted on a line so distant as to render the measures independent of any immediate control, demands my particular and separate commendation."

On the organization of General Pollock's Army Corps, Havlock was appointed Deputy Adjutant-General, and in the various affairs with the enemy to the westward of Jellalabad has been invariably brought to notice. At the capture of Kabul, as illustrious an affair as this has been witnessed on the late campaign, he was the senior present of his department.

He has twice appeared before the public in the character of an author, having published accounts of the Durand and first Afghan campaigns. We do not advert to this as comprising any Military merit, although we must confess it to be a desirable even in an Officer. His last work on Afghanistan is highly creditable to him, evincing, as it does, considerable professional knowledge. We have been induced to enter into these details by a desire to bring more prominently to notice the superior claims of this thorough soldier and excellent man, whose various services have, as yet met with no higher reward than has been conferred on men from fourteen to fifteen years (his junior) of indefinitely less, and comparatively ephemeral merits. Although but a Regimental Adjutant, we think a "Military Gazette" Commentary would not have been more than might have been awarded a man whose services "on the glorious 7th of April, in command of a detachment of recruits have been acknowledged as eminent."

—Norfolk and Military Gazette, Jan. 21.—Extracted from the Englishman.

Hyderabad, 11th March, 1843.—The wounded officers left in under charge of Dr. Campbell of Her Majesty's 23d Foot, for Bombay on the 7th instant in two steamers with a major and his wounded soldiers and sepahs. We shall be happy to hear of their safe arrival in Bombay. We are also looking out anxiously for Sir Charles' description of the battle of the Governor-General. The Service has really lost some most distinguished officers; the zeal and bravery of Major Fossdale, late commanding the 25th Bombay Native Infantry, were much to be felt with a whole section or more of his sepahs. Captain Foster, of the 10th Bengal Cavalry, and his brother-in-law, Captain Jackson, the Adjutant, fell almost at the same time. The former had been ordered to charge through the bed of the river, and from upon the opposite bank, while the latter, with twenty or thirty troops was dislodging a body of men upon the left. The brave Cookson's head was cleft to the brain by a heavy bullet, and a detachment of the 10th Cavalry Major Jackson was cut to pieces after he fell, in front I never saw any thing to equal the desperation with which the Beloches fought. How Sir Charles escaped is really wonderful, as he was in the hottest of the fire with bullets pouring around him. Had he not led on the men at the critical moment, and ordered the Cavalry to charge, the battle must have been a different one. The Artillery were very much cramped, and only four guns could be brought up; but their execution was unexceptionable as the heaps of dead near them clearly proved. The neighbourhood of our camp is quiet."—Dell's Gazette, March 25.

DEATH OF THE REV. J. A. MILLER.—We much regret to announce the death of Saturday last, after a painful illness, of the Rev. J. A. Miller, of the Church Missionary Society. The deceased was son-in-law to the excellent Instrumental and was thirty-five years of age. Had he laboured for several years in Tinnevely, and been instrumental in doing much good. He rejoined the Church Missionary Society some time after the death of Mr. Blenheim, but his health was so about proceeding to England on sick certificate, when it became evident that he could not survive many days, and through his passage and that of his wife had actually been taken on board the Duke of Argyle, he preferred to die in Madras. His death was peace. His remains were followed to the grave Sunday morning by a number of his ministerial brethren and other friends. He will long be affectionately remembered for his Christian spirit, his patience under suffering, and his labours near the Church Missionary Society.—Madras Record, March 21.

CHINA.

PROCLAMATIONS.—Eleop, Imperial High Commissioner, General of the Garrison of Canton, lately a Minister, &c., &c., and entitled to wear the "Red Girdle,"—is empowered and urgently impresses these clear Commands.

Whereas, two years have elapsed since the English first took up arms, it has now pleased our August Sovereign, in order to show that Heaven's aid, and with a universal benevolence that knows no exclusion, leniently to treat them, and to grant them a renewal of their former Communion, that he has graciously ordered that the people from the grief and suffering into which they have been cast, and the said English have, in the great number of their arms, yielded to this gentle treatment, followed the influences of Civilization, and ceased from strife.

The High Commissioner has come, in obedience to the Imperial Commands, to see that they may, in concert with the Governor General, Ke King, and the Governor, Liang-Ping-chang, consider and devise regulations for the levying of soldiers, and make all the other arrangements for peace. From henceforward, then, the Sea Coast will enjoy rest, and this frontier will have quiet after all its trials. Our gentry and our people are bound to joy and rejoice herein, and under the impulses of gratitude to sing, as they move, the praises of the Imperial benevolence. Towards the English they should set aside their past enmity, and so remove all root of future quarrel. For it is for this, that we have received, and will obey the Imperial Commands, it is not merely their object, that we should bend and give way to foreigners from afar.

But from what cause was it, that in the first week of December last, a quarrel was commenced from which ensued strife and bloodshed, when some of the foreign residences were set on fire and consumed, and in their mutual animosity, lives were on both sides taken! It would seem that, from a continuance of war and calamities, during these years past, the feeling of enmity and indignation had become so deepened,—that foolish people under the ideas of taking vengeance became the tools of lawless men, who feigned excuse to rob and plunder; that while there was not entire absence of cause given on the part of the foreigners, the animosity that exists on our part, and the animosity that calls for punishment. And the local officers have therefore been instructed, to apprehend with severity those lawless incendiaries and plunderers, who they may duly receive the punishment that the law commands.

The High Commissioner has further heard a rumor, that the gentry and scholars of the country around Canton, acting under the influence of a patriotic land of soldiers, to avenge this outrage, have formed a "Society of Spirit and Loyalty." And many of these gentry and scholars have recently presented themselves before the High Commissioner, to make a surrender of their services for purposes of war. These things are done, indeed, under the momentary impulse of a desire for loyalty and patriotism, but they are in direct opposition to the moral purpose of exceedingly indignant! But on consideration, this of our August Sovereign, tenderly to cherish men from afar, and well-treat those who yield him obedience,—and not less exposed to his great pleasure that lawless should cease and conscience be renewed.

The people of Canton are by nature unyielding and great lovers of peace, and when impelled by a sense of justice; they rigidly adhere to their pledged word, and where that is concerned are scrupulous of his drive; they frequently not will consent to be wronged, and in a moment have recourse to violent measures. Such dispositions are often the source of much good; but they are also the cause of much evil. For example, when the putative rebels, which the gentry, had inventing tor-ise landed together, lately, with the populace, and burned some of the Foreign factories,—the people engaged in this strife were of different characters and prompted by different motives; but they neither knew to exercise due care, before committing the deed, nor did they look forward to the consequences that might follow from it. All such popular acts, more of violence, are of this description.

Therefore, in addition to the clear command which the High Commissioner, verbally gave to the gentry and the scholars who signified before him, it behooves him, further, lest there should still be some of the war, in ignorance, of these principles, to issue this public and distinct proclamation for their due warning and admonition.

While we profess to be guided by the sentiments of loyalty and patriotism, we yet must know that we cannot but obey the Imperial Commands, and may on no account give cause for a renewal of hostilities. It is no doubt the part of loyalty to ward off insult from our shores; but to go to opposition to the Imperial Will, and in the straight line of one's own inclinations, cannot be deemed loyalty. Determinately part of patriotism; but to give cause for war and strife, is very much opposed to patriotism. Yet gentry and scholars, having read the sacred books, must understand reason. Do ye therefore take these commands, and improve the scene upon all good people; and show them that, if they set fire to houses and rob and plunder, they are not what they profess to be—"Righteous Men"; but they are thieves and vagabonds, and must proper will be to deter from such like acts, by making them their severe example. It has now been arranged by Treaty with England, that henceforth English foreigners shall not insult or injure our people;—and at the same time so long as English foreigners, live quietly and attend to their business, and do not offend, we will protect and molest them. Thus then, those from within and those from without, being at peace together, both parties may enjoy the benefit of living in perfect harmony, and the Sacred Emperor, has himself, so happily brought about.

The High Commissioner indulges the hope, that his people will not frustrate his good intentions, to guard against a recurrence of strife, and to give a full and complete security to all. Let every one tremble and obey! Do not oppose!

A MORE SOBERAL PROCLAMATION.
TAKSWANG, 22 day, 12 month, 22 day.
(25th January, 1843).

J. ROX. MORRISON,
Chinese Secretary and Interpreter.
(Signed) R. THOMAS,
Aidant, Translator and Interpreter.

The Grand Council hereby send this secret communication to the High Commissioner Eleop. On the 23rd day of the 11th moon of the 22nd Year of Tianswang (24th December 1842) we received the Imperial Commands to the following effect:

Keying has memorialized us, stating that Peking has appointed to him of a wanton massacre (of British subjects) at Fuzowon for the object of unduly obtaining Military merit, their false representations, and the fact that the British troops for Peace being now settled, it is not worth while for this one particular to risk the overturning of all previous arrangements. Eleop after his arrival at Canton, must immediately and previously explain to him, that the Ch'ien-lai Dynasty has for its principle in governing all foreigners without it is paid, to look upon them with the same feeling of universal benevolence, and that the previous massacre on her own children, and that shipwrecked foreigners, no matter what country they belong to, are treated with compassion and kindness, as by law required. He must also explain to him, that the moralized, handing up a complaint that the Commander of Fuzowon had wantonly massacred people, to gain Military merit, through false representations, the Grand Council have previously sent him in direct opposition to the moral purpose of exceedingly indignant! But on consideration, this is only a one-sided statement of the case, and His Majesty therefore readily permits to sentence. The Emperor has already issued an Imperial Edict, commanding Eling, Governor General of Fukien and Chekiang, to cross immediately over to Formosa, there to make secret enquiries and take the steps that may appear necessary, such as if the foreigners when Takungah previously killed were indeed people in distress, it will not be difficult to get proof of the fact direct from each of the investigation, that the Great Emperor rules with the utmost impartiality and justice, and will assuredly have Takungah (if innocent) sent to the prisoner to Peking, and punished with rigorous severity; further, that the Rules and Regulations for carrying on Commercial intercourse from now the most important thing to be deliberated upon, and settled, and all doubts and suspicions must previously be dismissed so that everything may be arranged satisfactorily." Eling, in his person, sustains a most important trust; he has had long and intimate acquaintance with affairs of the frontiers and he must be able to look up and emboss our own Imperial feelings and arrange all this business with the greatest care and respect. Let this Edict be forwarded at the rate of 800 li per day, for Eling's information. Respect this. We of the Grand Council therefore, in respectful obedience to the Imperial Will, now send on the same.

Interpreter.

Sir Henry Pottinger, Bart. Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, now addresses the Imperial High Commissioners, Eling, Sec. of the Governor General Keking, Sec., and the Governor Liang Foucheang, Sec., for the purpose of making a most important communication.

The Plenipotentiary having had an English translation made of the Imperial Edict, under date the 24th of December 1891, which was transmitted by the Grand Council on that day to the High Commissioners Eling, Sec., the Plenipotentiary is highly gratified to find from that document, that it has pleased His Imperial Majesty to issue His Gracious Commands that Eling, Governor General of Fukien and Chekiang, shall proceed to Formosa, to institute secret inquiries into the charges which the Plenipotentiary had made against the Chinese on the subject of the having, by false representations brought forward, with a view view to personal aggrandizement, obtained orders for putting to death certain distressed and innocent subjects of the Queen of Great Britain, who had been cast away on the Coast of Formosa, and the Plenipotentiary accordingly, begs to humbly request that the High Commissioners for his convincing proof of His Imperial Majesty's strict sense of justice, as well as against disposition to preserve and strengthen the Peace which has been happily established.

The Plenipotentiary by no means would presume to question, the indefeasible and perfectly acknowledged attribute of His Imperial Majesty; to intimate his high pleasure to all Officers of the Chinese Empire, in any language and form that may seem to His Imperial Majesty to be most fitting and expedient, but, looking to the fact, that the Edict in question, was specially communicated to the Plenipotentiary—who received it with all due respect—and further, that it will become the Plenipotentiary's duty to respectfully submit, through Her Majesty's Minister, the plenipotentiary of the Edict for the satisfaction and information of the Plenipotentiary's own most Gracious Sovereign, the Plenipotentiary thinks it right to record, with reference to the expression in the Edict which says "that the Celestial Dynasty has for its principle in governing all foreigners without its pale" that His Royal Highness Prince of Wales, acknowledged the Emperor of England acknowledged the Emperor of Germany, God, and that the Dignity, the Power, and the universal Benevolence, of Her Majesty, are known to be second to none, and are only equalled by Her Majesty's Royal favour and studious anxiety, to fulfil Her good promises and engagements.

The Plenipotentiary requests that a copy of this communication may be sent to the Grand Council, and also to His Excellency King, Governor General, Sec.

H. B. M.'s Plenipotentiary.

We are glad to report the arrival of the first Cargo of tea, ex Omega from China. It is impossible to exaggerate the advantages which may be derived from the temporary use of this tea for our own use. It is to be desired that arrangements may be made, by mutual association, as at Madras, Calcutta and Bombay, to build an Ice House and have an abundant supply as a stipulated price. We are told this Cargo was for the private use of the partners of a leading firm, which has taken a deep interest in our Island, since its very first settlement, and the whole of whose mercantile establishment, we hope to see here in the course of a couple of months.—Friend of China and Hongkong Gazette.

EXECUTION OF THE REBELS IN MARILLA.
At Yuenchi we received the following Flight, no. of the 5th instant, which private advices inform us of the execution of the rebels of the 3d regiment of the law.

On the 5th of February, upwards of 60 of the rebels were sentenced to die the death of traitors; forty-one were executed on the 5th and the others on the 11th instant, each day at 7 a.m. The spectacle was most imposing and awful.

The criminals, the day previous to their execution, were imprisoned in barracks in the neighbourhood of the artillery ground, accompanied by their confederates, their executioners were placed as guards over them. At about half past 6, each morning, they were unshackled, having only their arms tied, and were marched between two files of soldiers (their executioners) to the ground on which a large force was already stationed, consisting of about 3000 troops, forming three sides of a square. As the numerous procession approached, an officer proclaimed aloud to the troops, that whoever should ask for the pardon of any of the criminals should be shot.

At about half past 6, each morning, they were unshackled, having only their arms tied, and were marched between two files of soldiers (their executioners) to the ground on which a large force was already stationed, consisting of about 3000 troops, forming three sides of a square. As the numerous procession approached, an officer proclaimed aloud to the troops, that whoever should ask for the pardon of any of the criminals should be shot.

The remainder of the regiment to which the criminals belonged, formed the bottom of the square, and behind them a strong body of cavalry was posted, before whom their comrades were placed in rows, the executioners were placed on the ground on which a large force was already stationed, consisting of about 3000 troops, forming three sides of a square. masses of white ants, mould, &c. I send you some data connected with the progress of Education, extracted from the Report of the Bombay Board of Education for 1891; hoping it may direct the attention of your readers to what lies at the basis of all national regeneration—education. There exists at present much agitation of the public mind in connection with the measures for India, but all schemes will prove abortive except coupled with national education in English for the few, and in the vernaculars for the many.

The Elphinstone Normal Institution numbers nearly 700 pupils studying English; of whom one-half pay a fee of one Rupee monthly. Botany has been introduced as a branch of study in the higher classes, as also the elements of Moral Philosophy. The greatest eagerness is shown to acquire a knowledge of the English language. The Forbes School Department in connection with it, contains 725 boys; instruction is imparted in the Marathi, Gujarathi and Oordia languages. One great drawback to the spread of general education among the poorer classes of the Mohammedan population, is caused by the necessity which exists of devoting the early school years of the children to the requirement of ritual forms. The Poonah English School contains 119 pupils; History, Political Economy, &c. are studied. History is studied chiefly by manual instruction. One of the pupils has translated a Geography from English into the Marathi which is printed for the use of the Government and Marathi schools. The principles of talismans acted on in Wood's Edinburgh Social Science are being adopted. The pupils produce a letter as an exercise in composition every Monday. At Tannah in Salsette, is an English school composed of 77 boys. The Chapelle of the station takes an active interest in it.

Captain Candy, the Superintendent of Schools in the Decatur, reply to a request of the Government, states respecting the English Government schools that 1. There should be a vernacular school in every village; an English one in every Zillah, and a College for every Province. 2. An intense desire for the acquisition of English exists among numbers of natives; in one town they employed a Professor as their teacher. 3. That no scholar should be admitted into an English school who has not acquired a general knowledge of his native tongue. This would secure to the English schools a class of scholars with minds trained and exercised and who therefore would enter on their new study with favourable circumstances, while it would stimulate the boys in the vernacular schools to acquire the knowledge which will qualify them for admission into the English school. The Government has acceded to this suggestion. 4. That a good education should be made one of the grounds of qualification for Government employ. With the heads of departments to give annually two or three students of the junior grade to the scholars and distinguished for attainments and good conduct, the influence on the schools would be great. The Poonah Sanskrit College has been placed under European superintendence which has considerably improved the Institution. At the recommendation of Sir R. Grant the students are being instructed in the vernacular languages. The European system of medicine and astronomy have been introduced in the vernacular instruction. The senior students are taught English.

Government District Vernacular Schools, have been established in Guzerat and the Malabar country; since a Government Inspector has been appointed over them, an improved tone has been given to their operations. The teachers are very ignorant, and consequently little useful knowledge is acquired by the pupils. The number of students amounts to 106. The rule of Government reporting them is, "that schools shall be established only on a petition of the inhabitants of towns, the population of which is estimated at not less than 5000." Widow Schools were established under the sanction of Government in 1890, by

THE UNION BANK AND THE MAJESTY.

Mr. P. O'Hanlon has followed up his attack on Mr. Gordon, the Secretary of the Union Bank, by another letter, which has just appeared in the papers. The two points on which the attack rests are the loss sustained by Mr. O'Hanlon's son of Rs. 4431-3-11 by the failure of Messrs. Mackintosh and Co. ten years ago, and the mismanagement of the affairs of the Bank. Some allowance must be made for the warmth of his paternal feelings, but still the charge of breach of trust brought against the only member of the defunct firm now in India, in reference to this transaction, appears to be entirely groundless.

Capt. Fagan, it is said, sold a house for Capt. O'Hanlon and remitted the proceeds to Mackintosh and Co. to be held on his account. The Agents carried to his credit, and soon after failed. If it had been proved that Captain Fagan had directed this sum to be invested in public securities, or that Capt. O'Hanlon had made any such communication to the firm, the transaction would have assumed a serious aspect; but it appears to have been a simple matter of account. The sum ought not to have remained a day in the house without being entered in the books to the credit of some account. Mr. O'Hanlon writes, that when "perfectly aware of their impending bankruptcy, they got possession of so much of his property and converted it to their own use."

Yet in another part of the letter Mr. O'Hanlon says, that it was remitted to them from Nuseerabad, without their asking for it, and that they were told to hold it on account of his son. They obeyed their instructions. The son did not call for it before the bankruptcy, and he suffered in common with the rest of the creditors from not having got his money out in time—yet ten years after, Mr. O'Hanlon writes perpetually to Mr. Gordon, will you pay, or will you not. He says at the close of his letter that a competent legal authority will decide whether this "conversion and appropriation" were just. If he intends by this to say that the question is to be brought into Court, it appears inconsistent with the rules of equity to publish an expert statement calculated, though not intended, to bias the minds of the Judges.

But the more important part of the Magistrate's letter refers to the management of the Union Bank, from which he is very anxious to expel the Secretary. The absence of all caution in the dealings of the Bank with Gilmore and Co. is generally acknowledged and as generally lamented. The Bank has suffered severely for its loose way of doing business. Yet it is some little palliation of that carelessness that till the failure of that firm it had never suffered from the confidence which was reposed in the integrity and honour of the merchants it assisted. Both cultivators and traders? We cannot see the fairness of selecting the Secretary for the scape goat trust. Both of them forgot that a bank is on such an occasion, or making him answerable but a large pawnbroking establishment and ought to regulate its accommodation on the same sureties of the Directors, and the indulgence of and safe principles which guide the pawnbroker. The Bank of Bengal got out of the scrape first; not the consequence to demand the name of the mainly, we believe, because of the admixture of Government Directors in its Committee. The in whom the capital of this Bank is now rest—Union Bank Direction was composed entirely of ed.

those who wished to borrow, and a reform of the system became more difficult, Mr. Gordon's predecessor stated that if he were to urge on his masters to refuse advances on that which was in his power to do so, it would give mutual force—if he had said mortal offence, he would have been nearer the mark. The blame of the losses rests more with the Directors than with the Secretary, and more with the Proprietors than the Directors; for it was a well-known fact that the funds of the Bank were shared among a few houses, to such an extent and upon such security, as no individual proprietor, would have sanctioned if he had enjoyed the disposal of his own money. It was known that this pernicious system of credit must continue unchecked as long as the Directors were chosen from what may be called the House List; yet, year after year, did the proprietors run the same round of election, without ever attempting to get out of the circle.

Mr. Gordon may be fonder of speculation than Mr. O'Hanlon; or than is altogether safe, at the present, perhaps even at any time. But the real question is whether the present position of the Bank has arisen from the speculative turn of the Secretary; and there is nothing in the disclosures which have been made to support such an idea. On the contrary, it appears that the embezzlements of the Bank Bank have grown out of the advances which have been made to merchants and cultivators upon the pledge of indigo factories, sugar mills, and the like. They have arisen from its having locked up its capital, for the most part, in those agricultural speculations which swept the old houses into the gulph of bankruptcy, notwithstanding the larger share of profit which they reaped to themselves. Has this devotion of capital arisen from the preponderance of Mr. Gordon's influence, or that of the Directors in the management of the Bank? It is generally understood ed that the Secretary has been overruled by his masters, not the Directors by the Secretary; and we think there is little reason to doubt that if he and returned it. After this Captain Ward's right to dispose of it according to his own wishes became undoubted. But the gallant Captain must excuse the freedom of our observing that while we so suddenly commended his piety in the hands of Assignees. Mr. O'Hanlon says, thinking of the new Cathedral on such an occasion, we wish he had consulted one of the meeting of proprietors the appropriation of forty lakhs of our capital by a few cultivators and traders. This was unavailing to induce caution or reserve. The sum advanced in this way has been nearly doubled." And with whom does the blame rest, but with those proprietors, who, notwithstanding Mr. O'Hanlon's denunciation continued listlessly to permit the capital to ooze out till it was entirely absorbed by a few cultivators and traders? We cannot see the fairness of selecting the Secretary for the scape goat

Mr. O'Hanlon seems to think that to expel Mr. Gordon from the Secretaryship would be the salvation of the Bank. We doubt whether his removal would improve its prospects. The factious Abbot asked the Assemblée Nationale of Paris during the French Revolution, whether his being hung up at the guillotine-post, would enable them to see any better. And we may ask with equal confidence whether the ejection of Mr. Gordon would impose any cheque on the dangerous system into which the Bank has fallen. We believe it is owing in a great measure to Mr. Gordon's influence that matters are no worse. They may not go right under a successor. By whom is that success to be chosen? By the same majority of proprietors who have perpetuated the election of Directors in certain firms to which Mr. O'Hanlon, not without justice, attributes much of its present embarrassments. Will a successor thus chosen be less under the influence of the Directors; less disposed to yield to their wishes in disposing of the funds of the Bank, to suit the convenience of a section of the mercantile community? It is not in the nature of things that it should be so. Mr. Gordon has the benefit of experience, and he is backed by the public voice; and though he has received every provocation to retire, we hope he will continue at his post till he has relieved the Bank from its perilous connections, and restored its credit.

THE NINGPO BELL.—We publish below an explanation which Capt. Warden has sent to a contemporary relative to the Bell, which he presented to the Bishop for the Cathedral, from among the spoils of Ningpo. It entirely exonerates him from all blame in having made a private appropriation of this article of plunder. It appears that the city was not given up to private plunder, as the Englishman supposed. The Bell came into Capt. Warden's possession, and he made it over as in duty bound to the prize Agent, who considered it of no value to him. After this Captain Warden's right to dispose of it according to his own wishes became undoubted. But the gallant Captain must excuse the freedom of our observing that while we so suddenly commended his piety in the hands of Assignees. Mr. O'Hanlon says, thinking of the new Cathedral on such an occasion, we wish he had consulted one of the Chaplains sent with the expedition, as to the propriety of the gift. We think they would have saved him from the anomaly of presenting to God what had been rejected by men. They would have directed him to the canon of Scripture, in which he would have read, "Whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall thou not offer, for it shall not be acceptable for you."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENGLISHMAN.
Sir,—Having last yesterday seen in your paper, the remarks of the Friend of India, upon my presenting a Bell to the Bishop, for the New Cathedral of Calcutta, I beg to offer a few remarks in reply thereto, for his satisfaction.

The Friend of India observes, "I had no right to this Bill, it being the property of the Crown, or the Privy Council, and ought to have been made over to the Privy Agents." In all this, the Friend of India is quite correct. The Bill in question, was made over to the Privy Agents, and by them rejected, not being of sufficient value, as it was iron, to repay them for the expense of remitting it.

Consequently, as they rejected it and would have nothing to do with it, and as I wrote it, kept it, and brought it round to Calcutta, for the purpose to which I have since applied it, and I consider I had an undoubted right so to do, and I hope after this explanation, the Friend of India will think so too.

I am, Sir, your's obediently,
W. WARDEN, Q.C.S.

THE LANDHOLDERS'S SOCIETY.—The Herkara of Saturday last says, that from the manner in which we have epitomized the proceedings of the Landholder's Society, he might be led to believe that the reconstitution of that long dormant body had caused us some uneasiness. We see no cause for uneasiness, and are not aware of having used any expression, from which such a feeling might be inferred. In common with the rest of the community we have been amused with the singularity of its present movements, and have thought it not unworthy of comment.

The Society was established with the view of affording Government the assistance of its influence and advice in the administration of the country. After having got up a renaissance on the subject of the Resumptions, and offered some comments on the New Sale Law, it faded its arms and went to sleep. Those who are not versed in the national character may be astonished that a Society with so high and animating an object before it, should have thus continued in a state of suspended animation for so long a period as two entire years. Those again who remember the large claims which it advanced to public confidence, as the guardian of public rights and interests, will naturally be surprised that it should have failed to afford to Government any aid whatever in the construction of those various important acts which have been discussed or passed during this period, regarding the protection of immovable and immovable property against wrongful possession in cases of succession—the collection and payment of debts due to deceased persons—the provision of measures connected with public health and convenience—the emigration of labourers to the Mauritius—the Registration of deeds and the abolition of slavery; the besides many minor arrangements which have been made for the improved administration of justice. All these measures have been discussed, with more or less eagerness, by all classes of society; the Landholder's Society alone has been silent. It is well for India that its improvement has not been dependent in the smallest degree on its exertions.

This total neglect of those public interests for the protection of which the Association was ostensibly established, is strongly contrasted with law, which is rigid punctuality. We have now the bustling activity which marks its present movement. It appears to have arisen from its members and held its first meeting at its new offices on the 22d of March. In the brief space of three weeks it has made arrangements for establishing a system of Registry throughout the country; it has taken up questions connected with the Sale law—the resumption of Allodial lands, and of lands under 50 biggas—the remission of fines on remittances to the General Treasury; and has extended its efforts to the settlement recently concluded in the North West Provinces. These grave and important subjects have been brought forward and discussed, and memorials have been drawn up to Government with rapidity which almost surprises the mind. They require large observation, much experience, and deep thought, yet they appear to be disposed of at a railroad pace. The Society seems resolved to make up for lost time at all hazards; to establish the fact of its existence by the extent and variety of the subjects it overhauls, without any particular reference to the utility of its interference. In its anxiety to do something which shall keep it before the public, it has even travelled to the Western Provinces, where its members have no interests whatever at stake.

Is it surmountable that we should entertain some doubts of the permanent utility of a body subject to such extremes of sloth and labour; that we should feel a presentiment that the present paroxysm is too violent to last, and that it will in all probability be succeeded, in the natural course of things, by another fit of comatolency, during the continuance of which the Government will be left to carry on the administration of the country from its own resources, without advice or counsel from the Landholders? It must be perfectly obvious that

Mr. George Thompson is the moving cause of the activity which the Society now exhibits; and there is reason to apprehend that when he is no longer here to animate it with his own spirit, it will fall back into a state of torpidity. Our opinion of the utility of such an association remains without alteration. Although it represents but one interest, that of the landholder, and its representations must therefore be received with some allowance for human infirmity, yet it comprises many men of great local experience and knowledge, and some men of superior liberality of thought, and may therefore exert a salutary influence over measures which are designed for the welfare of the country. But to make that influence beneficial, it must be steadily and permanently exercised. The Society must not mistake the paroxysms of feverish excitement for healthful energy.

With respect to the proposal regarding the Notice of Sale which the Landholder's Society is anxious to obtain, and our remarks on which appear to the Herkara to indicate that we have followed the example of that body and fallen asleep also, we offer the following explanation. Our contemporary says that the Society pays for the enactment of the Third Section of the original draft of the Law, and that if we had referred to the section specified we should have avoided the mistake into which we have fallen. On reference to the third section however we found that it had been enacted, and stood as Section III. of the Law. We therefore concluded that it was some other notice which the landholders desired; and we naturally suspected that it had reference to some intimation to the de-facting, which might impair the principle of the notice they require, is that specification of estates in arrears which it was originally intended to affix in the public officers and at the Cutchery of the de-falter; and which for reasons which appeared good and sufficient to Government, was omitted in the Act subsequently passed. As we may shortly expect the Landholder's memorial on the subject, we shall not attempt to anti-mate its arguments. The three objects which Government proposed in the enactment of the new law, were, that the revenue should be punctually paid; that the sale of estates, with all the numerous inconveniences which the poor system suffered from every change of masters, should be diminished; and that estates when put up to sale should realize their full value. How far the law has answered those objects; if not, how far the suggestions of the Landholders are likely to secure their accomplishment, we shall be able to judge when the document is before us.

The Herkara says, we are equally wide of the mark in saying that the Landholder's Society has resolved to memorialize the Government in favour of a permanent settlement in the North West Provinces previously to obtaining all the necessary information. "The resolution runs thus:—'Resolved,—That the Secretary be directed to take the necessary measures for obtaining information respecting the settlements already made in the North Western Provinces and Cutch, and to draw up a memorandum on the subject, to be hereafter submitted to the Committee, with a view to the preparation of a memorial in favour of the permanent settlement of those portions of the British possessions in India.'

We may be mistaken in our opinion, but we understood this resolution to mean that the Landholder's Society had made up its mind to memorialize Government in favour of a permanent settlement; and that the Secretary was directed to procure information for the support of the memorial. If the resolution had stated that the information was intended to enable the Society to judge of the propriety or impropriety of proposing Government that the settlement might be made perpetual, we should not have fallen into this error, if indeed we are in error. Let the Herkara assure us that the question of the perpetual settlement is yet an open one with the Landholder's Society, and we will at once retract our remarks; but in this case we must trust that body to be a little more explicit in its phraseology. The insupportable objections we entertain to any permanent and unalterable settlement, in a country where every thing is subject to alterations, we shall be prepared to urge as soon as the Memorial is ready.

Finally, we beg to offer the Landholder's Society not only a "kindly notice" of their inaction in the cause of Registration, but the tribute of our humble commendation. Only we regret that their inaction was not offered at an earlier stage of the business, and that it comes after the question has been disposed of. It will not probably be brought forward again till Lord Ellenborough's late views on his political principles have matured the complicated details of such a measure. We fear that it is in vain to expect that his Lordship will be able to command such leisure, during his administration. The address of the Society on this subject, however valuable, would have been more to the point if it bore fewer tokens of haste. But we rejoice to find the landholders more than they expected the most forcible opposition to a measure which, so far as it intended to secure exactness and diminish its expense, is so diametrically opposed to the general character. We cannot hope, that after such a question has been under consideration for nearly two years, and has been laid on the shelf, it opens under the disadvantage of being opposed by so many hundred miles from the Govern-

General. But whenever the subject comes round again, their commentaries will be found valuable, and their co-operation still more so.

THE BENGAL BRITISH INDIA SOCIETY.—At the last meeting of Native and other gentlemen, including Mr. Speede, at the Fouldrass Bala-khans, Mr. George Thompson proposed the establishment of a British India Society, upon the model, we believe of that which he had assisted in forming in England. The following are the rules of the proposed Association.

I.—That in the deliberate and solemn judgment of this Meeting, the circumstances of the British Indian Empire and the relations subsisting between that empire and the Government and people of Great Britain, impose upon every individual member of the community, the duty of doing all in his power to ameliorate the condition of the people, and to advance the general prosperity of this country.

II.—That it is the opinion of this Meeting that, in addition to individual efforts, it is expedient and necessary that a Society should be formed in Calcutta, upon a basis that shall admit of the friendly co-operation of all persons anxious to promote the good of India, and the improvement, efficiency and stability of the British Government, without respect of Caste, Creed, Place of Birth, or Rank in Society.

III.—That a Society be now formed and designated The Bengal British India Society, the object of which shall be, the collection and dissemination of information, relating to the actual condition of the people of British India, and the Laws, Institutions and Resources of the country; and to employ such other means of a reasonable and lawful character, as may appear calculated to secure the welfare, extend the just rights, and advance the interests of all classes of our fellow subjects.

IV.—That the Society shall adopt and recommend such measures only, as are consistent with pure loyalty to the person and government of the reigning Sovereign of the said dominions, and the due observance of the laws and Regulations of this country; and shall discontinue every effort to subvert legal authority, or disturb the peace and well-being of the country.

V.—That all persons of adult age, and not at the time receiving instruction in any public institution, contributing to the funds of the Society, and consistently subscribing to the above fundamental Resolutions shall be eligible to Membership.

VI.—That the following gentlemen be a Committee to prepare an Address to the public, in the spirit of the foregoing resolutions, together with a list of officers, and such Rules and Regulations as may appear to be necessary for the management of the affairs of the Society, and that they submit the same to a general meeting of Members, to be held in this place on Thursday Evening the 1st instant.

The object which is here proposed to the Native of India, is worthy of all praise; and any Society which shall employ itself steadily in the collection of information relative to the actual state of the people and the laws, institutions and resources of the country, will deserve the gratitude both of the community and the Government. One great obstacle to a wise and beneficial administration in India, is our comparative ignorance of the habits and feelings of the people, and of the influence of the institutions which have been introduced by the Government; and if in proportion as this ignorance continues, must we continue to legislate at hazard. Government has neglected no opportunity which presented itself of obtaining correct data of the condition of the people, or of the result of its own measures. All the information within its reach has been carefully collected, and even when it has told decidedly against the wisdom of its arrangements, has been fearlessly published to the world. The educated Natives are in a much more advantageous position for collecting and communicating this information than any other class in the community. It is in this department of labour that the can become the most valuable auxiliaries of Government; and it is to be hoped that the impulse which Mr. George Thompson has communicated, will survive his departure. These representations will be received with deference by the ruling authorities in proportion to the correctness with which they are drawn up, and the sound judgment they exhibit.

We think he might have left out of his address, the ungracious remark that "a portion at least of the public press will aid the Society." Why should not the whole press aid the Society in such an undertaking? Every symptom of improvement in Native Society was hailed with joy, and every attempt at national amelioration was warmly encouraged, without exception, by the public journals in Calcutta, till the present agitation began and the Mookerjee Bala-khans and the Old Hindoos began to abuse the public authorities, and to use language which every man of right feeling felt to be unjust. The change in the sentiments of the Press was the natural and inevitable consequence of the change which had been so suddenly produced in the feelings, and views of the natives. The papers which had been steadily remonstrating with Government on public abuses, and using every argument which appeared likely to secure reform, felt it a matter of duty to suspend this peaceful agitation of grievances, and to rally round a Government so ungenerously, so unjustly assailed. In the objects which the new Society proposes to itself, we are certain the co-operation of the press of India will be unanimous.

We hope the Meeting to be held on the 20th, will modify the 4th Resolution, and leave out altogether the talk about "pure loyalty to the person and government of the reigning sovereign." The loyalty of the Native community in Calcutta has never been doubted; and it would be unwise to give colour to the suspicion that any change had been wrought in its feelings or sentiments which rendered the affirmation of its loyalty necessary. When India was threatened with an invasion from across the Indus, and the Persian newspapers in Calcutta were calling on the Natives to rise and expell us, such an expression of loyalty to the British Government would have been most appropriate. But there is no political crisis now impending; peace smiles upon us; there is no agitation but at the Fouldrass Bala-khans; and surely this is not of so serious a character as to render it necessary to come forward with an assurance of loyalty to the British Crown.

THE NEW SACRIFICIAL APPOINTMENTS.—We have received a letter signed Rufus on the summary dismissal of the officers employed in the Saugur and Nerubudda Territories, which we feel it improper to publish. The writer deals in innuendoes; he applies disparaging epithets to the Governor General; he imputes improper motives for the appointments which have been made. To publish the letter would do Lord Ellenborough no good; and ourselves no injury. We carry the idea of editorial responsibility a little further than our contemporary of the Harbinger, though we impeach not his judgment as to the extent of freedom which he allows his correspondents to indulge in. We have invariably endeavoured to act upon the maxim of not permitting any correspondent to make this journal the channel of personal observations which we should shrink from placing in our editorial columns. The publication of sentiments which may appear to us erroneous, we do not object to, because nothing serves more effectually to elicit truth (than the free discussion of opinions; but we cannot sanction the publication of epithets of abuse when the Governor General is the subject of them, any more than we can consent to disseminate a charge against the (Villains of systematically encouraging corruption in their Native officers from interested motives. Such sentiments as these: "May the tongue and heart burnings be his inflicted on the many, follow him!" "He has sought popularity in loudly crying out on benevolent intentions;" (an expression evidently second hand, a mere imitation of the Satirist, when he says that Lord Ellenborough has imitated Sampson, not only in the matter of the Gates, but in slaying his enemies with the jaw bone of an ass?)—Does the Mahout expect to find all submit their necks as he would wish?—may or may not express public opinion; but we consider the publication of them objectionable, and must transfer the responsibility to others.

On one section in the letter, we are diametrically at issue with our correspondent. "I say and so say all around me that it is a disgusting instance of the exercise of power to push on his own friends, or his friend's friends." Never was our correspondent more entirely mistaken. Lord Ellenborough has not, we believe, in a single instance pushed on his own friends, or his friend's friends. He has, on the contrary, regarded the solicitation of his friends as any thing but a recommendation of a candidate. It is a mere act of justice to his Lordship to state that the vast patronage which which he is invested—the greatest entrusted to any subject—has been distributed on the purest and most disinterested principles. This is the great redeeming point in the present administration. Never has any Governor General so signally disappointed his friends and even his relatives at home, as Lord Ellenborough. In his hand the patronage of India has been lost to all Ministerial purposes. He has invariably sought out merit and rewarded it. He may have been sometimes mistaken in the objects of his support; and the rewards he has bestowed have not been in keeping with the habits and aptitude of the individual; but the principle visible in all his appointments has been such as to command general admiration.

The error of the administration lies in the marked disfavour manifested towards those who distinguished themselves under Lord Auckland's administration. It is impossible to mistake his Lordship's feelings with regard to the men who served their country with zeal under his predecessor. We have sought for some palliation of these feelings in the individual character of the men, but the general prescription which has pursued them, resembles too much the prescriptions of Seylla, for its character to be mistaken. We deeply regret this prejudice; for there is nothing so fatal to the reputation of a mind. He may commit great errors and yet be safe with posterity, but mankind seldom forgive and never forget their want of generosity which attempts a blind faith. The dismissal of the Saugur functionaries is so serious and whole-some a manner, and the appearance of having been done in a just, and a Governor General must be above such a feeling, if he would retain public respect. In whatever point of view we regard this sweeping ejection, objections rise up thick against it. It is unjust to the officers who have been ejected. They had applied themselves successfully to the discharge of their duties, and had been rewarded with Interpreterships and Advancements in their respective corps. Browne, Doolan, Banks, Hamilton, Duncan, Herbert, Hayes, Boland had all resigned those appointments to accept of situations in the political line, and they are now dismissed without ceremony, and remanded to their regimental pay, with a slur on their characters. They are in a worse position than as though they had not qualified themselves for public employment; for they return to their corps to regimental duty, and regimental pay, with a slur on their characters.

They cannot all have been guilty of having caused the outbreak. If an example had been made of the most culpable, their fate might have been noted as a warning to others. But the indiscriminate dismissal of the whole body, can produce no other effect than to repress the zeal and ardor of all by showing them that there is no certain reward for distinguished exertions, and that caprice may in a moment blot the prospects of the most deserving. His Lordship, it is said, wished to remodel the Agency.

But would it not have been better to have allowed it to remain as it was, than to have adopted a measure which destroys the character of Government for calmness, wisdom and justice? After all, it is much to be doubted whether the appointment of new men, unacquainted with the language, habits and feelings of the people, to work the new plan, will not neutralize the effects of any wisdom which may have been exercised in constructing it. The employment of men who have not passed an examination, is moreover unjust to the rest of the service if it is to be regarded as an exception to the rule, and very unwise if it is to become the rule. The value of our administration in the East depends mainly upon the degree in which our functionaries acquire the language of the people. The principle of connecting proficiency in the languages with promotion in the service, cannot be too rigidly enforced; and whatever tends to impair it, must be detrimental to the character, and fatal to the utility of our Government.

THE LOTTERIES.—The State Lottery has been suspended pending a reference to the Court of Directors; and the small fry of the minor lotteries have disappeared. But we are sorry to perceive that the evil is likely to be perpetuated by private speculators. The papers of the week announce the Establishment of a Private Lottery Company, with a Capital of One lakh of Rupees, though upon what principles we are not informed. The Third Lottery of this Company is also announced. It comprises 3000 Tickets at 50 Rupees each; or 150,000 Rs. while the sum to be given away in prizes is stated at Rs. 144,510, leaving a clear profit to the speculators of only 5490 Rs. or about three and a half per cent.; the very moderation of which is calculated to create some misgivings. It seems incredible that any individuals should embark in an expensive scheme, which offered so inadequate a return. But let that pass. The example which has thus been set, is we fear too likely to become contagious in a city in which habits of gambling have been so long encouraged; and we may expect that lotteries will spring up rapidly in every direction, each vying with its rival in plausibility and attraction.

Thus the evils which grew out of the most of the great State Lottery will be perpetuated, and perhaps extended, and the cause of public morals will have gained nothing by its abolition.

It is necessary to apply a legislative check to the establishment of such lotteries, and indeed of all lotteries. As soon therefore as the action of the Court of Directors shall have been received to the permanent discontinuance of the Government Lottery, we hope to see the draft of an Act, forbidding their establishment by private individuals. We trust the favourable decision of the Court will be received before Mr. Bird quits the Government in October next, that he may be enabled to consummate the good work he has begun, and deliver society entirely from the evil of Lotteries.

EDUCATION IN THE NORTH WEST PROVINCES.

—We have the pleasure of publishing a valuable Memoirandum on the Education of the Agra Presidency drawn up at home by a gentleman in the Civil Service, who has devoted all the energies of his mind to the promotion of Education in India, and whose intimate acquaintance with the habits and feelings of the people in the North West Provinces, gives a peculiar value to his suggestions.

It is an undeniable fact that the attempt to impart the blessings of education to the districts in Upper Hindoostan through the medium of English, have not been attended with those gratifying results which are visible in and around the metropolis. The scale of attainments which the students reach before they quit the scene of instruction in the West is far inferior to that attained by the successful youths in the Mughal, and Hindoo Colleges, and the General Assembly's Institution. In the interior of the country the English Schools are in a still more languid and inefficient state. This is easily accounted for. In the metropolis of our power, and the great mart of our commerce, the feelings and the interests of Native society are closely identified with a knowledge of English.

A native youth in Calcutta who has not a good English tongue and pen, is held in little or no estimation. English is become so common that the acquisition of it is easy, and ignorance of it disreputable. It is not so even at Agra and Delhi. In those cities there are not perhaps more than two hundred individuals in the military excepted—who are in the habit of using it; and every European and East Indian is acquainted with the vernacular tongue. The obstacles to the acquisition of a familiar knowledge of English are as great in those cities, as the facilities are great in Calcutta. Neither is English necessary to the prospects of the students. It leads to no situation worth more than a Hindoo Rupee a month. Those who have devoted the period of youth to the acquisition of it, have obtained no peculiar distinction in society; and the subordinate position they occupy is rather a discouragement than a stimulus to others. Hence it becomes a matter of duty to modify the system of instruction, and to endeavour to impart useful knowledge through vernacular channels, reserving the study of English for the few who have leisure and zeal for the study of it. When a nation is at our disposal that important period of life in which habits are to be formed, and information to be acquired which shall give the tone, for good or evil, to his future life, this confidence ought to be considered as crossing a corresponding obligation on our part to give him the most substantial benefits in our power. To allow that period to be frittered away in a vain attempt to acquire a foreign language which he cannot sufficiently master to turn to any account, when he might, through his own tongue, acquire a superiority, can scarcely be considered as any other light than a violation of trust. Now it is certain that nine-tenths of the youths who attend our English Schools in the North-West, will carry away nothing but a smattering of English, which they will forget in a twelvemonth, and which if they could retain, would stand them in no stead when they come on the theatre of life. It is certain that with suitable vernacular books, they would be able to acquire during that same period solid and important knowledge, the influence of which would continue with them through life. Our system of education should therefore be remodelled, and our attention bestowed primarily, but not exclusively, on indigenous tuition.

But Schools without constant and vigilant superintendence are never of much use. The masters and scholars must feel that they are subject to a system of supervision, and that neglect of duty will not pass unnoticed and unreproved, or will remain without encouragement. If the state of the Schools in the North West Provinces presents matter for painful remark, let us remember that the fault lies at our own door, and may be remedied. What would be the condition of the Native Courts in the interior if they were left to themselves, as the Schools have been left;—if the control over their proceedings was equally distant, occasional and feeble? The same system of control which has rendered the Courts efficient, would render the Schools efficient also. In this country, far more than in England, faithful and periodical superintendence must be the soul of every system of education; and if we cannot thus breathe a living soul into it, the inanimate body had better be removed out of our sight.

It is physically impossible that any system of education in the North West Provinces can be adequately superintended by any functionary in Calcutta, however admirable his qualifications for the task may be. It would be deemed a mockery to place a School at Bangalore under the control of a Secretary of Public Instruction at Calcutta. Is it not equally preposterous to subject to his supervision a School as remote as that of Hurdly or Sangor? If it be intended that the Schools in the North West shall exist merely to stop the mouths of those who cavil at our Government for the neglect of popular education, the present system will answer the purpose; if it be desired that they should become instrumental in elevating the national mind, a separate Educational Secretary for the Agra Presidency is indispensable. He should be encumbered with no other duties; his undivided energies should be devoted to this single object. The expense of such an office need create no alarm. Almost every Governor General contrives to throw a ray on public objects which suit his own fancy, as much money as would keep half a dozen such Secretaries. The Secretary of Public Instruction for the North West should be stationed in the most central position, probably at Allahabad. The four months of winter should be devoted to circuit duties; every school should be personally visited, if possible, twice in the year, that the Secretary may be enabled to ascertain its progress; to ensure efficiency; to encourage zeal, and practically to teach the people, high and low, that Government attaches as much importance to its educational as to its legal institutions. During the rest of the year he might be usefully employed in constant correspondence with the Masters, in preparing School books, in procuring translations, and in devising means for imparting the stimulus of motives to the Schools under him. This he will be able to effect by keeping before the various public officers the names of the most successful scholars, and labouring to secure their admission to public offices. The Schools would thus become the nurseries of the Service; the Service, the stimulus of the Schools. Such a system steadily pursued, would give a new and elevated direction to the feelings and hopes of Native society, and produce a degree of intellectual and administrative improvement of which we can now form but a faint idea.

With these Preliminary observations, we now introduce the Memorandum to the notice of our Readers. It refers to a three-fold division of Schools. The first embraces the indigenous vernacular Schools, which with a little encouragement and the aid of a few books, might be rendered efficient to a considerable degree at little expense. The second class refers to the District Schools of which many already exist. The plan proposes to enlarge the scale of instruction; to impart to the pupils through the medium of their native tongue as large a portion as possible of European morals and general information so as to fit them to become virtuous, well informed and useful members of Government; and to give an English education to those who are likely from their character and circumstances to profit by it. It is proposed to adopt in reference to these Schools the plan which has been found so successful at Bombay, of allowing no youth to apply to English before he is grounded in his own language. The third part of the system embraces the establishment of a Normal School to complete the education of youths destined for the service of the state in the four departments of Civil and Criminal Law, Medicine, Civil Engineering and Terrorism. But the great point on which the efficiency of this scheme and indeed of any scheme depends, is the establishment of an adequate agency in the North West Provinces, for the inspection and control of the Seminaries and Schools. And if Government could obtain the services of an individual on its own establishment who should unite with the requisite mental qualifications, an enthusiasm in the cause of national education, it would be to dictate equally of wisdom and benevolence to entrust the system to his care, and to constitute him the Minister of Public Instruction. Lord Ellenborough has the Government of Agra in his own hands. He has pledged himself to devise means for the improvement of the country. He is more independent of the Court of Directors, and more absolute than any Governor General since Lord Wellesley. He has a contempt for money when any scheme of probable utility strikes his fancy. Will he give the North West Provinces an Education Minister?

To the Editor of the Friend of India.
MEMORANDUM ON THE EDUCATION OF THE AGRA PROVINCE.

It appears evident that the Education of the N. W. Provinces cannot be efficiently superintended even by the ablest Authorities stationed in Calcutta. The manners, feelings, and languages of the people are quite different from those of Bengal; and the distances of the schools renders their inspection and examination physically impossible. The truth of this position is confirmed by the conclusions now proposed by the Calcutta Committee of Education, and sanctioned by Government, for remedying the proved inefficiency of the present system; namely, that Mr. Thomas, member of the Allahabad Board of Revenue, should superintend the Agra and Delhi colleges; Captain Marshall, G. G.'s Agent, that at Benares; and the Masters of the larger schools overlook those of the smaller ones.

These distinguished officers will no doubt gladly discharge the extra-official duties imposed upon them; but would it not be better to appoint one active and zealous Superintendent of Education, with head-quarters at Agra or Allahabad? Unfettered by a Committee, a Secretaryship to Government, or any other duties, nothing should be allowed to interfere with his educational labours. It should be his duty to make an annual circuit, and personally examine every Zillah school during the cold weather, furnishing a full report to Government immediately on his return. During the hot weather and rains, he might be usefully occupied in superintending the preparation and printing of a complete series of school-books in English, with counterpart versions in all the vernacular dialects of Hindustan; in overlooking a Central Normal College to be established at its head-quarters; and in acting as a general centre of communication and information to the translators and other friends of Education throughout the country. In these labours he should be aided by Assistants selected from the most deserving Schoolmasters.

The Schools might be divided into Three Classes.

1. THE INDIGENEOUS VERNACULAR SCHOOLS, conducted by native teachers on their own account. These might be assisted with small grants of books, maps, &c. under the general supervision of the Masters of Zillah Schools, and money payments given by the Superintendent at the annual examinations to such as distinguished themselves by the superior proficiency and number of their pupils. An immense field of primary education would thus be brought under the influence and direction of Government at a small expense; and abundant sources open for supplying the Zillah schools with a class of boys, already, in some measure, acquainted with their own language, and the elements of European knowledge.

The course of Education at these schools would at first be limited to the arts of Reading and Writing the vernacular; Arithmetic; Weights and Measures; Book-keeping; and the elements of History, Geography, and Natural History; but the character and proficiency of both teachers and pupils might be expected rapidly to improve under a system of encouragement and vigilant inspection.

2. ZILLAH SCHOOLS, under English Masters, assisted by Native Teachers. Into these schools no boy unable to read and write in the vernacular, should be admitted. The main object should be, to diffuse among the pupils, through the medium of their native tongue, as large a portion as possible of European morals and general information so as to fit them to become virtuous, well-informed, and useful servants of Government, and worthy leaders of the march of improvement among their fellow countrymen.

Where, from the talents and character of any boy, and the pecuniary resources of his family, there may appear a reasonable probability of his remaining at school long enough to acquire a thorough knowledge of English, the Master should give him instruction in that language, and carry his educational course as high as possible, through that medium; but the acquisition of a mere smattering of English, as a substitute for all other useful knowledge, should be discontinued.

It should be the aim of the Master to attract to the school as many boys as possible of the higher ranks of native society, the sons of Zemindars, Barbers, Officers of Government, &c. &c., who would be able to remain longer at school, and from their rank and wealth, be more likely to make good use of their knowledge after leaving it.

The Education given in these schools might

A thorough knowledge of the Hindustani and English languages; Arithmetic—Geometry—Linear Drawing—Mechanics—Measurement, and Surveying.
Geography—Astronomy—History.
Natural History—Physiology—The Chemistry of daily life—and a general knowledge of the conditions of Health in the human frame.
The Elements of Botany and Vegetable Physiology, with reference to Gardening, Planting, Agriculture, and Medicine.
Civil Engineering.
Political Economy.
Regulations, Law, and Principles of Jurisprudence.
Principles and Practices of the Art of Tuition.

Each School should have a good garden, and the boys be encouraged to work in it by the example of the Master, who would thus be enabled to impart such useful practical information, and cherish a fondness for agricultural pursuits, so necessary in a country where the Revenue is raised almost entirely from the land.

When the Master is a married man, and his wife competent, a girls' school should be established, if possible, under her superintendence.

The Schoolmasters should be formed into a regular service, with Superannuation, Widow, and Orphan Funds. This would be a bond of union and discipline; and prevent Masters rashly throwing up their employments.

3rd. A CENTRAL NORMAL COLLEGE, at Agra or Allahabad, for completing the education of the most promising youths, destined for the service of Government in the four departments of

CIVIL AND CRIMINAL LAW, MEDICINE,
CIVIL ENGINEERING.

A certain number of Scholarships in these four departments, the number in each department varying according to the exigencies of the service, might be offered annually by Government to be competed for by the whole of the Zillah Schools. The selection to be made by the College Council, on written answers to sets of questions framed with reference to the different departments, Medicine, or Miscellaneous, as shown by the School Registers, to be a sufficient ground of Rejection; industry and good principle, as well as more elevations, being necessary for a Government Officer. The Masters of these Schools which turned out the greatest number of successful candidates, to be presented and rewarded, as these examinations would form a good test of the relative state and proficiency of the different schools.

On the selection of the Students to fill the scholarships of the different departments, their education would thereafter assume a more strictly professional shape. Examinations would be held annually; and qualified students receive Diplomas of proficiency and character, which would entitle them to vacant situations in their respective departments.

Scholarships to be limited to three years, and liable to be forfeited by idleness or misconduct.

Young men desirous of qualifying themselves for any department of Government employ, to be allowed to attend lectures at the College, and be eligible for diplomas.

The College Council to consist of the Superintendent as Visitor, the Principal, and all the Head Teachers. These might be selected from the best Schoolmasters; also a zealous and intelligent Medical Officer, with an experienced Normal Teacher, and a Civil Engineer, from Britain.

Besides lecture rooms and sleeping accommodations for two hundred scholarship students, the College should have Lithograph and Printing Presses, for the preparation of a uniform series of school books, English and Vernacular—a large

Thursday last, in the presence of a numerous assemblage of the principal gentry, European and native, and ladies of the island, at half past five, by the Right Rev. the Metropolitan, assisted by the Right Rev. the Diocesan, the Captain Goodfellow, civil architect. There were present on the occasion the Hon. Sir George Arthur, Governor; H. E. Sir Thomas Munro, the Hon. Mr. Anderson; the Hon. Mr. Reid; the Ven. Archdeacon Jeffreys; the Rev. Messrs. Fletcher and Pratt; Major-General Vallance; Mr. Willoughby; Colonel Moore, Captain Jamieson, &c. &c. The Metropolitan was seated on the eastward of the site of the stone on the right; on the left was the Diocesan; and in the centre the Hon. the Governor; behind them were H. E. the Commander-in-Chief, and the Hon. Mr. Anderson; on the north side were the Hon. Mr. Reid, Sir James Macleod, the Ven. the Archdeacon. The Diocesan commenced the ceremony by reciting the 127th Psalm. The Metropolitan then offered up a solemn and appropriate prayer. The Diocesan next read the inscription on the silver plate, of which the following is a copy:—

In the reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty QUEEN VICTORIA; and under the Government of
THE HON^{BLE} SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, K. C. B.,

THE HONOURABLE EAST INDIA COMPANY AND
OF THE Friends of the late

RIGHT HON^{BLE} SIR ROBERT GRANT,

Governor of the Presidency,
Who died at Daponee, 28th July, 1838,
IN MEMORY OF THE

OF INDIA,

ON THURSDAY, MARCH 30th, 1843,
IN THE PRESENCE OF THE HON^{BLE} LORD AND OTHER CHIEF PERSONAGES
PRESIDENCY OF BOMBAY.

The Metropolitan then placed the plate in its depository, after which the stone was lowered down and settled in its proper place; and in a prayer in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, desired that the good man, and kind, the college commonly called, and to be known by the name of the "Grant Medical College." He next read a feeling, eloquent, and generous address, in which he enquired, in the strongest and most affectionate terms, the memory of his late lamented friend, Sir Robert Grant, to whose virtues he directed, in the warmest terms, his particular attention, dwelling on them in beautiful and feeling language. At the conclusion of his speech, and on resuming his chair, his Lordship was universally applauded. Mr. Willoughby rose and returned thanks, on the part of the committee of the Grant Testimonial, in a most and excellent speech, to his Lordship for his kindness in honouring them with his presence, and performing the interesting ceremony that evening witnessed, and requesting, in the name of the committee, that his Lordship would kindly permit his address to be printed. The Metropolitan, in acknowledging, in most courteous terms, the honour done him, stated that he thought the speech of his Lordship to be published, but stated, if they desired it, it was at their service. He then courteously saluted the company, and retired.—Communicated.—The Daily Times, April 1, 1843.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NORA MISIONARY SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in sending you the following particulars concerning our local Institution the Agri Missionary Society, in the hope that a short account of it will prove interesting to many readers of your valuable journal.

The third Annual General Meeting took place in the Union Chapel—a very neat and recently erected building situated in the civil lines of this station, on the evening of Thursday the 10th instant; Captain J. H. Mackenzie, of the Artillery, presiding. The place was well filled and the kindness of the meeting was gone through in a manner that left an aspiration in every bosom for "peace on earth and good will to men" especially to the benighted heathen whose spiritual interests it had assembled to promote.

The Report, read on the occasion, of the transactions of the Society for the past year was more than usually interesting. It stated that the Society had embraced, in comparison with the preceding year, a more extensive field of usefulness, which had been productive not only of much general good but of much spiritual benefit to individuals; this was particularly manifest in the villages where the reception of the Gospel had been most encouraging and hopeful of future success.

The Report stated that the Society had eight native Christians attached to the Mission,—six of whom were employed as preachers, one was an inquirer and candidate for Missionary work and an aged Christian was a pious and true distributor. The labours of the agents in connection with the Mission Chapel were of an encouraging nature. Week-day and Sunday preaching had been regularly attended to on these occasions, both in the Chapel and near a Platform erected for the convenience of travellers; the attendance had ranged from 40 to 60 persons,—two prayer meetings had been kept up during the month and the weekly lectures for the spiritual improvement of the Agents had also been delivered with the greatest regularity.

Of itinerant labours the Report was full of interesting particulars; the Missionaries had been sent two and two within a circuit of 60 miles, they had preached and distributed the Holy Scriptures in about 112 new villages 8 cities and 14 Melas and it was given as the united opinion of the Missionaries that there is manifest and decided improvement on past years both in the manner and extent with which the villagers welcome them and listen to Gospel truths; they were looked up on as Melas as Teachers and were sought out to come and preach to an assembled and inquisitive audience,—they had in particular instances been affectionately treated, sheltered and their wants supplied by respectable Zemindars and in the Cities of Bhamptore and Mattia especially where formerly they used to be hoisted their labours were followed with peculiar marks of encouragement and success.

The Report dwelt at length—as the expressed opinion of the Missionaries,—on the necessity of a more liberal support to inquirers and converts who are deterred from leaving all they have been accustomed to hold dear and sacred and embracing Christianity,—from the fear of being left destitute;—and suggested that if a village were acquired or rented it would afford an acceptable asylum to many an anxious inquirer who would openly become a Christian, but who cannot, under present circumstances, get over the difficulty of his future maintenance if once out of his home and occupations.

The Report further made respectful mention of the Rev. H. Williams who had been obliged to leave this scene of his usefulness to seek repose in his shattered constitution by a sea voyage to his native land. The Committee, with their wonted diligence, availed themselves of Mr. Williams' valuable assistance to endeavour if health and time permitted to awaken an interest in Britain in behalf of the Society, and if it should please God to make him successful the Society will then be placed in a better position to supply the want of an efficient superintendent as also to establish what is exceedingly desirable an institution for the training up of pious East Indian and native converts for the work of the ministry with the view of supplying in some measure the present urgent want of an efficient active Ministry.

This interesting Institution has not yet succeeded in its endeavours to obtain the Services of a European Superintendent which are much required, and which the Committee have made considerable exertions to procure; but from all that is seen and heard it is this general impression that this Society, composed by a union of Christians of all denominations, to promote the best interests of the heathen around us, has met with a considerable measure of the divine blessing. It has overcome its first difficulties, it is progressing in its efforts of disinterested benevolence and it is gradually but certainly gaining the favour, support, and co-operation of the prayers of an increasing number of far and near, who believe that there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, but that all are one in Jesus Christ. Referring you for further particulars to the Report which has been ordered to be printed and circulated,

I have the honour to remain,
Yours faithfully,

Agri, 20th March, 1843.

RELIGIOUS.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON, while addressing his recently-published charge to the quærens—whether a clergyman when preaching should wear a surplice or gown, recommends it as "most consonant with the tradition of the church, that he should wear a surplice when preaching after the morning service, and gown when the sermon is in the evening." His lordship's sentiments on this, as on some other points, would appear to have undergone an alteration from black to white; for in the year 1824, while Bishop of Chichester, his language to the clergy of the diocese was—"Gentlemen, it is most consonant with the tradition of the church that you should, while preaching array yourselves in black." Indeed his Lordship seems to have signified the divisions in the Church by the mass he suggested to lead them, for the congregation adopted the adoption of the white surplice as the signal of having embraced the peculiar views of what is called the Catholic Church, while the black gown is the colour of the preacher of the Protestant Church of England. It is said that the Bishop of London is now, and is very unhappy at the lament and dissension which has resulted from his late London. He had suggested the adoption of the white surplice as the signal of having embraced the peculiar views of what is called the Catholic Church, while the black gown is the colour of the preacher of the Protestant Church of England. CANTON IN SCOTLAND.—A funeral sermon has been returned to the memorial of the No-Unionism Convention lately held in Edinburgh, conveyed in a letter from Sir J. Graham to the Moderator of the General Assembly, which embodies the decision of Government. We give the following extract:—

A church established by law cannot quarrel with the courts of law and equity relate its respect for its authority of Parliament.

The statute law is but the voice of the legislature, the final declaration of its will. The civil court is the expositor of its intentions, the instrument whereby its purpose is effected. If the status of Anns were repealed to-morrow and another law substituted in its place, disputed questions would arise, and the new statute in its turn like every other statute, though based on which the establishment of the Church of Scotland rests, could only be enforced by the jurisdiction and decrees of these civil tribunals which are the subjects of jealousy to the Assembly, and whose judgments are resented as encroachments on spiritual power.

And further, with regard to alterations of the existing law to be proposed by Parliament. The No-Unionism Government must observe, that the demand of the Assembly is not a declaration of the law, which might remove doubts, and difficulties in the spirit of concord and good-will, but a subversion of the existing law, and a total abolition of patronage.

Mr. M'Jenny's arguments have evoked no dissatisfaction to prevent the abolition of the civil authority even by express enactment, and to secure to the church in the matter of collation all the judicial power which it can reasonably claim.

The wish of Government to head these unhappy divisions, and to close this unseemly spectacle of a church in connection with the state openly violating the law, remains unabated and sincere.

We are convinced that the civil authority established by law in Scotland has produced the best practical effect on the moral and religious character of the people. It has well fulfilled its duty, and it is to its important purposes for which it was founded; and any shock which might endanger this great national establishment would be regarded by Mr. M'Jenny's arguments as a fearful calamity.

But in resisting the abolition of patronage, Mr. M'Jenny's servants believe that they are maintaining a right which is conducive to the welfare and stability of the church itself.

bring his infant child into the state church to be sprinkled, was at first panicked in the payment of a heavy fine, which was intended to compel him to obey the regulations. As he did not of his own accord pay the money exacted of him, he was fined still further, and his furniture, even to chairs and beds, was seized and taken from him. These measures having failed to shake the firmness of the better-minded wife, the magistrate then threatened to take the child from him by force, and to perform upon it themselves the rite of church baptism. The next step was the seizure of this threat, a guardian was appointed to the child and the parents. At length, on last Monday, the plan was carried fully into effect. The guardian, taking advantage of the absence of the wife, came into the house with a band of police officers and soldiers, and demanded the child of the mother. Upon her refusal to surrender it, the infant was torn from her by force and immediately dragged away in order to have the act of church baptism, so called, performed upon it, before the father could return to prevent it. To prevent the recurrence of such scenes, the brethren propose to petition the Government for a relaxation of the laws in their behalf. Their prospects of success in this application are not, however, for the present, at least, the most encouraging.—Feb.

MARTYRDOM OF TWO HON. NATIVE CHRISTIANS.—Again the noble martyrs of the Lord Jesus have been made to flow in the midst of the heathen. The district of Voinango is now stained with the blood of two devoted disciples to the little flock which has been gathered into the hospitable province of the chief Obidiah; though, of course, the murderous orders were issued, as formerly, from that "city of violence" which is rapidly filling up the mountains of the interior. The narrative of the event received from the disinterested Christians only yesterday, is briefly this.—Obidiah had heard that some king or kings of Ambongo would receive the Christians, but no messenger having arrived from that part, and he, not knowing whether one or all were favourably disposed, determined to send two trusty Christians to ascertain what prospect of success existed, and to make themselves acquainted with the road. He selected for the purpose Estahina and Balaubaba, and sent them on their way, accompanied by the wife of the latter and a little slave girl, probably intended to tell suspicion in case of their being observed by the Queen's people passing over the boundaries of the Balaubaba country, where a guard is stationed to prevent all persons attempting to pass into the enemy's country. They crossed the frontier in safety, and arrived at the house of a friend, to whom they showed their copies of the Scriptures. He was anxious to tell suspicion to a neighbouring king, called Ilwanatindila, was desirous to hear and know the word of God; and "Come," said he, "sit ye all up together and see him personally." They agreed to the proposal, and having written to Obidiah and Balaubaba, and another Voinango Christian, to inform them of the arrangement, they proceeded on their journey, leaving at the house of their friend the woman and little girl to wait their return. During their absence, the woman and her young companion became alarmed, and fled to invade the territory of the Queen—their own land. They reached the boundary, but, in repassing, they were apprehended by the guardian or land-warden, and being slowly questioned by him, the women, as it afterwards appeared, confessed all they knew respecting the places of Obidiah and Balaubaba, and the visit of two men to Ilwanatindila, and wrote immediately to the Queen and officers at Ambongo on the subject. At the same time, the two men returned from their visit, and finding that the woman had fled, they instantly set off in pursuit of her, fearing she would be caught and inform against them. They fell into the hands of the land-warden, who was, no doubt, looking out for them. They were taken up to the village as prisoners, and subsequently sent to the Queen for judgment. There they were subjected to similar tortures and questions to urge them to implore others, and the former martyrs had to undergo such as "Who sent me on this errand, and what was your design?" "We went," said they, "of our own free will, not being constrained by any one; and our design was to try and soften by instruction in the word of God, the hearts of those robber-chiefs, who were daily stealing our cattle, and commit violence against our country (Voinango). That was why we took these men." Again they were asked, "Who are the usual number of people who were to follow you?" and did you not intend to take up arms against the Queen?" They replied, "As to our design, we do not deny that we proposed to go for judgment on the paying people; we did so, as she looks fond upon us testily; but as to taking up arms against Balaubaba, we never intended that." We demand the name by which they were called, and the names of the Queen were ever entertained by us." They were condemned to death, and ordered to be executed in their own country, even upon the scaffold, a of the other on the scaffold, in the market-place. These days fall, I believe, upon the 19th and 20th of June last. To a messenger of the Christians who took them food during the interval, they on one occasion whispered an affectionate farewell to all the Christians; saying, "Let them not fear that we shall disclose their names; we shall do them no harm; but say farewell. If we do not meet them again on earth, we shall meet in the future life." With undiminished fortitude they kept this noble promise to the last; and seem to have been ever cheerful in death. Obidiah speaks of them as having come to the place of execution with their companions. Their heads were cut off after execution, stuck on poles, and left to bleach in the scorching sun of Imberia, as an intended warning to the people, but really serving as an additional evidence of the unshaken courage of the Queen, and the sustaining power of that grace which kept our departed friends faithful unto death.—(From a letter from Mr. Baker of the Mauritius).—Feb.

NICHOLAS'S COURT.

STATUE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—On Monday the committee under whose auspices the city equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington by the late Sir F. Chantrey (completed since his death by Mr. Watson) is intended to be erected, were summoned to inspect the full-sized model in the studio in Belgrave place, the figure of his Grace, in clay, having been placed on horseback in order to judge of the general effect previous to being cast in bronze. The horse has already been. Sir F. Laurie, Dr. Croly, Mr. Rainbow (the secretary), Mr. Barclay, jun., Mr. Chadwick, and several other members, attended and expressed themselves well pleased with the design, and after their departure, we believe, the Lord Mayor (as office a good judge of a horse) and some other members were present, the latter opening a Commercial hall in the city, where, they were similarly gratified by the appearance of the group. The Duke is seated in a very erect military position—his breast advanced, his left hand holding the bridle, and his right holding the "martial" reins, resting easily on his thigh and the saddle. The likeness is forcible, and the head uncovered. The costume is very simple—the whole neither man, from the waist to the toe, is clothed in one unbroken paludament, whilst a short cloak over the shoulders, and is skillfully draped over the whole back, and partially down each side. The head of the horse is full of spirit, and the legs are all standing on all four legs, and not in action. The entire height is rather more than 15 feet; and the execution of Sir Francis was, as we might expect, the result of Lady Chantrey, as agreed upon by Sir F. Laurie devoted (as the site near the Mansion-house, dependent on the building of the Royal Exchange, would be cleared for its reception by the Duke of Wellington, he paid their request to Lady Chantrey, and having received of refreshments with her, retired.—Literary Gazette.

CITY ACTIVITIES.—Amongst the most important works now in progress in the City, connected with its improvement, is that of the extension of the sewerage through Lud-lane, connected with the main leading sewer in Finner's street. The excavations, which are from eighteen to twenty feet deep, have during the last week exhibited some interesting features relative to the early history of the City. Some few coins, principally of Antoninus, and a few interesting fragments of Roman and Saxon pottery, with household utensils, have been found; but the chief objects of interest have been the discovery of some vestiges of the foundation walls of some old Roman buildings. The most extensive of these was found last week open to the street, and Mr. Chapman of the Strand-Works, where the excavations arrived at a wall composed of flints, about eighteen feet below the surface, which we between five and six feet in thickness, and through which they had some difficulty in passing. A certain guess line of wall was also found in the excavations for laying the foundation for the extensive warehouses of the City, and some other buildings, and others have been found in other excavations in the neighbourhood, which lead to the idea that on this spot there formerly stood a castle or other extensive building. A wall was also found in the excavations and another wall running in a parallel line below it, between this and Coney-street, about twelve feet apart. At the lower depth was a fine stratum of gravel, and the upper portion of the Lud-lane, which was in a state of decay, and in some places had fallen into the street. Above this was found the site of the foundation of the old London destroyed by the fire of London, the rubbish of which, without the aid of carts, was removed from the site of the modern buildings. Opposite to the church walls in Coney-street, at the depth of about eighteen feet, there was found a large quantity of human bones, several of which were identified as a place of deposit, which must have been covered with the time of the Romans.—Feb.

A LITERARY CURIOSITY.—A Poetical friend of ours, says the Boston Transcript, had a paper folder with the following line from Gray marked on it.—"The ploughman homeward plods his weary way." On looking at the quotation, it occurred to him that it might be expressed in various ways, without destroying the rhyme or altering the sense. In a short time he produced the following alternative readings. We doubt whether another line can be found, the words being so aptly adapted to so many variations, and still retain the original sense.

The weary ploughman plods his homeward way. The weary ploughman homeward plods his way. The ploughman, weary, homeward plods his way. Weary the ploughman plods his homeward way. Weary the ploughman homeward plods his way. Homeward the ploughman plods his way. Homeward the weary ploughman plods his way. Homeward the ploughman, weary, plods his way. The homeward ploughman weary plods his way. The homeward ploughman plods his weary way. Feb.

"OLD MORTALITY."—The only occupation of the old man was wandering about the country, visiting the tombs of his ancestors, travelling from one church-yard to another, musing on his old white pony, till he was found dead one day by the road side. His family experienced a singular variety of fortune. One of his sons, who had been settled at Baltimore, where he made a large fortune, had a son, who married an American lady, and the latter, out-riding her husband, became Marquis of Wellington. His daughter was married to Jerome Bonaparte, and after her separation from his wedded Monsieur Serrier, the French consul at Baltimore. What was Old Mortality here said, as he scored among the neglected grave-stones in Scotland, had he foreseen that the widow of his grandson was to become an English Marchioness, sister-in-law of the Duke of Wellington, and his grand-daughter Countess of Westphalia, and sister-in-law of Napoleon I.—Lancet's Courier.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER'S SUCCESS VICTORY OVER THE BELUCHES.—On Friday morning intelligence was received through the Bombay Times and Courier Express, that Sir Charles Napier had again engaged and discomfited a large army of Beluchese, within six miles of Hyderabad. The battle was severely contested for three hours. The position of the enemy was admirably chosen, and their works were so strong, that in the opinion of those capable of forming a comparison, they could scarcely have been rendered stronger by European engineers. The Beluchese fought with desperate valor, and sustained a loss of 6000 killed and two thousand wounded. Our loss was by no means trifling. Two officers and 37 men were killed, and eleven officers and 217 men wounded. Though all the troops engaged on this occasion, distinguished themselves by their valour, the brunt of the action, and the larger proportion of the casualties, fell on Her Majesty's 23d Regiment. Sir Charles Napier increased his own reputation—if that was possible—by the admirable disposition of his forces, and his undaunted gallantry. As on the former occasion, he exposed his own person in the thickest of the action, almost beyond the rules of Military prudence. The result has been a complete victory, and the capture of all the guns and standards of the enemy. They have fled in the direction of Meerpoor, against which town it was said to be the General's intention to advance by forced marches, in the hope of capturing that noted of enemies before the garrison could be fully prepared for resistance.

This second engagement places our position in Scinde in a new and yet very agreeable point of view. Never have we yet encountered so formidable or persevering a foe on the plains of India. In all other wars within the Indies, as one grand decisive victory has, almost without exception, decided the campaign, and extinguished opposition. In all our recent engagements with the wild and warlike tribes beyond the Indies, they have been found to trust chiefly to their local advantages, to their mountain fastnesses and defiles. In Scinde, however, the Beluchese have met us upon open ground and fought pitched battles with a degree of courage and obstinacy which could scarcely have been exceeded by European troops. So far from being disheartened by the first signal defeat in which they lost 3000 men and their whole park of artillery, they have assembled another army nearly as numerous, and brought a fresh army of guns against us. Instead of waiting for us to attack them in their strong holds, they have boldly advanced against us almost to the verge of our entrenchments, and assailed us in a position in which we enjoyed every advantage. With a recklessness of danger never yet exhibited by natives of India they have assembled an army, flushed with victory and strengthened by reinforcements, after having been previously defeated by half its number. Though the Government of the Amoyers has been misrepresented, and not without justice, as the most galling despotism in India, they have succeeded in attaching to their rule a race of soldiers, who appear ready to shed the last drop of blood in their cause.

It is natural to infer from these circumstances that the retention of Scinde will be no easy task; that it must be long before the country settles down into tranquillity under a Government, which will necessarily deprive the Beluchese chieftain of his authority, and the soldier of his profession. A spirit of the most determined hostility to us is combined with great military resources and courage, in those whom our administration will reduce to insignificance and want. A large force must therefore be maintained in Scinde; an untrusting vigilance must mark our administration, for the least reverse sustained, even by a small detachment would bring down a swarm of determined warriors into the field. We have how however gone too far to recede. For good or for evil, we must retain the country. Scinde is an integral part of India within the Indies, and the general feelings of our own subjects and allies will be far more affected by the current of events in that country, than it was by our discomfiture in Afghanistan. Our positions must be strengthened along the banks of the Indus, at all hazards; a large army must be maintained, and an uninterrupted communication kept up between Hyderabad and Bombay by means of steam. These arrangements will involve a large expenditure—though not to the extent the Bombay Times predicates; but this expenditure must be borne in spite of the Finance Committees.

Viewing the success which has attended the British arms under Sir Charles Napier, in connection with the melancholy narrative of our discomfiture and disgrace given in Captain Eyre's volume, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that if he had commanded the troops at Cabul when the outbreak occurred, his course would have been brief enough. He would at once have adopted the most energetic measures, and strangled the insurrection in its cradle. There would have been no loss of moments, far less of days; no temporizing with the crisis; no ill-devised, faint hearted plans of resistance. He would not have allowed mistletoe to overcome the natural courage of the soldiers, till it ended in the entire demoralization, in a military sense, of that force. He would have inspired them with confidence in his arrangements, and breathed into them his own soul of fire. Had it fallen to the lot of Napier at that hour of emergency to exclaim, "44th, Advance,"—as in the battle of Hyderabad, he called out to the 22d—the winter of 1841 would not have furnished the most gloomy record in our Indian annals.

ENGLISH PLEADERS IN THE SUPREME COURT.—Some year or two ago an application was made to the Sudder Court for leave to employ a barrister of the Supreme Court in the management of a suit; but it was refused except on the condition that he should plead in Oordoo, which which he was known to be unacquainted. The ground of objection to English pleadings, urged at the time, was just. It was said that to admit of pleadings on one side which the advocates of the opposite party could not comprehend, would be anomalous; that to give one party the advantage of pleadings in the language of the Judge, which his opponent was too poor to secure, would be unfair; and that it would compromise the character of the Court for impartiality. It was evident that no decision passed under such circumstances could command the confidence of suitors; that if the Judge decided in favour of the party, who employed an English advocate to plead in English, he would be supposed to lean to his own countrymen; if he decided against the party who employed this advantage, it would in all probability be attributed to ad hoc—a word for which our own language furnishes no adequate term;—and it would have been surmised that the Judges had taken this mode of showing their anxiety to exclude English pleaders from the bar.

It is now stated, that a wealthy native has petitioned the Court for permission to employ Mr. Prinsep, one of the Barristers of the Supreme Court and the Company's Standing Counsel, to plead his cause in English. The Court has taken a favourable view of the petition, and is said to have recommended that the Barristers of the Queen's Court shall be considered pleaders in their own Court; and of course that they shall be at liberty to employ their own language in pleading for their clients. There are many considerations in favour of this innovation, and but one apparently opposed to it. It must be evident that a sailor who employs a well trained English advocate, must enjoy a great advantage over an opponent who may employ an ordinary native pleader. To render such an arrangement just, therefore, it will be necessary to provide that it shall be admitted only in cases in which the opposite party may agree to it. This he will not do, when he is too poor to purchase the same benefit of advocacy. English Barristers will thus be engaged only in those large cases in which both parties are sufficiently rich to obtain their assistance. A wealthy native will in no case be permitted to employ a European advocate to crush his indigent opponent. The remuneration given for this legal advice will, we suppose, exceed in almost every instance the established rate of fees; but the party cast will, according to the rules of the Court, be called upon to pay no fees in excess of that scale.

Many advantages appear likely to spring from the admission of the Barristers of the Supreme Court to the bar of the Sudder. The personal benefit to the Barristers themselves of opening a new scene of professional exertion, at a time when business in the Supreme Court is dull, will not be among the least satisfactory results of the arrangement. It is upon the interests of the country, however, that the benefit of this change will tell most decisively. The confidence of the public in the Sudder Court will be augmented by the introduction of men possessed of much intelligence and independence of character, as English Barristers. Their legal acumen will tend to facilitate the administration of justice. The judges may be expected to derive as much advantage as the suitors from the employment of an superior class of advocates; and the arrangement will give a new and improved character to the proceedings of this Court. It will also tend to facilitate and hasten the very desirable amelioration of the law.

operation of the two Courts, the Supreme Court and the Sudder.

The operation of this rule is likely to be equally beneficial in reference to the subordinate Courts throughout the country. No suits are now admitted into the Sudder Court, but in as great numbers from those tribunals. It will be no small advantage to the cause of justice in the interior that their decisions should be subjected to the keen and fearless scrutiny of men possessed of such high legal attainments, as the Baristers of the Supreme Court. In their hands the merits of the decrees passed in the Courts below, will receive perhaps a closer investigation than the Judges, with their multifarious engagements, could bestow on them. Whatever irregularities may have been committed, will be detected and exposed. We can scarcely fancy a more effective check on abuses in the subordinate Courts than the submission of their decisions to the examination of an accomplished English Barister. As soon as this plan begins to work, a more urgent necessity will be created for improving the construction of these Courts, and raising the character of its Judges. Government will be constrained moreover, to reconstitute the Covenanted Judicial service, and to establish means for training up men to a knowledge of the Civil Law. The unfortunate Judges, who, without having done a day's duty in a Civil Court, perhaps without having opened a book on Civil Law for eight or ten years, is suddenly called up from a Criminal or a Fiscal Court, to preside over the legal arrangements of a large district, and to hear appeals from men far better versed than himself in the rules and practice of the law, finds himself even at present in a position by no means enviable. How much more awkward will that position be rendered, when his crude decisions, which have excited the surprise of his subordinates, come to be dissected by the practised hand of an English lawyer.

THE LANDHOLDERS' SOCIETY.—The Hurkar thinks an expensive and hyperbical in its remark that the Landholder's Society had turned out of its own goodness to advocate a permanent settlement in the Western Provinces. He considers it inconsistent that we should ensure that body for taking this settlement question in hand, while at the same time we blame it for having neglected to bestow its advice on Government when the abolition of slavery was on the tapis. The settlement in the West however is a matter in which the Landholder's Society of Bengal can have only a constructive interest. The question of slavery larvels in personal interests. The number of slaves in the Bengal division of this Presidency is stated to be a hundred thousand; and they are held in bondage in many instances by the individuals whom this Society claims to represent. The emancipation of so large a body from slavery, was certainly an omission on which we should naturally have expected to see the Landholder's Society at the post it had chosen.

The subject of the settlement in the North West Provinces is not very accurately represented in the Hurkar. He speaks of those provinces as being unsettled, and affirms that a settlement had been promised to them "through a long series of years by successive Governors General." The fact is that the country has been, though not permanently so. The ablest servants of Government have employed far more than eight years in investigating the condition of the land, its rising boundaries of cultivation, and determining the right of proprietorship. Up on these investigations a settlement has been concluded, in every instance for twenty, and in some, for thirty years. The settlement added little to the revenues of Government, but is generally understood to have given satisfaction to the people, to have diminished the evils of litigation, and to have imparted a fresh impulse to agricultural improvement. At any rate, there is no monument of our Government since we took possession of the country, more deserving of public approbation, whether we regard purity of motive or extent of labour, than the settlement usually called Mr. Bird's Settlement of the Western Provinces. Neither did, successive Governors General promise a permanent settlement through a long series of years. Such a settlement was prematurely and unduly promised by the present Lord Cowley, then Mr. Henry Wellesley, who had been sent to take charge of the administration of the country by his brother, the Governor General, when it first came into our possession. That promise was subsequently renewed subject to the confirmation of the Court of Directors. The Directors refused to confirm it, and ordered settlements to be made for limited periods, whereby agriculture was discouraged and the people impoverished. The determination of the Court of Directors to sanction no settlement of an unalienable nature, and for an indefinite period, has been a sufficient reason with every Governor General since the days of Lord Wellesley, for abstaining from any such unconditional promise.

The Hurkar thinks it rather strange that the disinterestedness of the Society's efforts—in thus taking the Western Settlement under its fostering wing—"should be considered a feature in its character worthy of censure." We are aware that some of our readers will be disposed to smile at the "disinterestedness" of this tour in the Western Provinces, into Lord Ellenborough's own country; but we are anxious to treat the motives of others with the same respect which we claim for our own. We do not censure either this charitable tour, or its motives; only we think it injudicious. If the representations which the Mookjee Baboo and the Old Hindoo have given of the size of our Government, at all approach the truth, there are grievances enough in Bengal to occupy the Society till the next Charter—when the European and Native functionaries are expected to change places, and the administration to be made over to the alumni of the Hindoo College. The memorials of the Landholder's Society moreover will naturally carry more weight with Government, when they refer to grievances under which the memosilates themselves labour, and of which they can speak from personal experience. They are more likely to obtain redress, when they can show that the shoe pinches them and their connections, than that it pinches their countrymen a thousand miles off. In common with the Hurkar we wish that the Society should be "pragmatic and effective," "began secure this and it must not undertake too much at once; it must confine the sphere of its exertions to the province of Bengal, even at the risk of precluding limits to its disinterestedness. The Western Provinces are scarcely more its neighbours, by geographical position, than the Presidency of Madras. Madras still groans under a far greater grievance than could be found in these Provinces. The settlement they have obtained is a good one, and the yield of its currency sufficient to encourage agricultural enterprise. At Madras the heavy "onus" of the inland duties still continues to repress the national energies and to retard improvement. Now, though it would be very disparaging in the Landholder's Society to lavish information with a view to political gain for their abolition, it would be doing but wise. It would give its members occasion to hold up its proceedings to disproof, by presenting it as a Universal Grievance, by which, whose object was not so much the relief of its own members from evils that were acknowledged, and felt as a general blotting with the affairs of India. We temper the Society on "disinterested" advice to drop the Settlement question. It will only serve to weaken their influence in matters connected with their countrymen's interests. The Settlement will not be touched upon their representations, neither will Government be commoved for not allowing it to be bidden. It has been the result of long, patient and enlightened efforts. Apparently, it is well. It would be unstatesmanlike to disturb the landed tenures of twenty millions of men; at least until sufficient time has elapsed for testing the result of arrangements which have been made by the highest talent and zeal which Government could command.

THE BELL AND THE GATE.—The Hurkar takes us to task for objecting to the employment of the Ningpo Bell in the new Cathedral, and as the March mail has not yet arrived, we take advantage of the moment to offer a final remark on this interesting subject. If our contemporary will peruse our article, he will find that we have not objected to its being suspended in the belfry of the edifice, on the score of its being a Heathen bell, adorned with heathen hieroglyphics, and heretofore used in heathen worship. We ventured to question the propriety of its being employed in a Christian Church, on the ground that it was an article of plunder, captured in a war of aggression upon an innocent people; and that it had been already offered to the Prince Committee, and refused, as of little worth. We object to the association of Christianity with war in any other shape than to mitigate its evil. In our apprehension there are many and not a few objections to the suspension even of those trophies of victory which have been honourably gained on the field of battle in edifice consecrated to a religion whose weapons are spiritual and not carnal. They may find a more appropriate destination in the Armory, the Museum, and the royal Palace. But there is a still higher objection to the acceptance of any article which should give even the bitterest enemies of Christian truth a handle for saying that a Christian Church had become the receptacle of stolen goods.

The Hurkar has thrown out a hint to Lord Ellenborough to bestow the Somerset Gates on the new Cathedral in Calcutta, to form the base of the pulpit. The idea is quite original; and demands serious consideration. We have carefully weighed all the arguments which we carefully might be adduced and for against such a termination of their inauspicious journey; but we must confess that in our humble judgment it does not appear to be altogether feasible. The objections which are likely to be raised both by the Bishop and the Governor General, will be fatal to the scheme. "The objections of the Bishop would be of course by a religious—those of Lord Ellenborough, of a political character. It is true that in the opinion of a large portion of European artists which have been denounced by aggressive with idolatry and false religion, and the conanted to the use of the Christian Church. Thus the Egyptian obelisk, notwithstanding its Pagan and heathen associations, now forms the chief ornament in the square of St. Peter's at Rome. The Baldachin which adorns the high altar at the base of which burn the hundred lamps around the tomb of the Apostle, was torn from a temple dedicated to Heathen rites; and even the Chair of St. Peter is said to be but a relic of Mahomedanism, of which the inscription is concealed; though the tradition rests upon uncertain authority. The Bishop of Calcutta however will not consider the practice of Romanism a model for Protestants, or seek to distinguish St. Peter's in Calcutta by trophies similar to those which adorn St. Peter's in Rome.

But Lord Ellenborough must also be committed on the occasion; and though his Lordship may have personal as well as hereditary partiality for Calcutta, yet the Gates have been already decided for the restored Temple of Somnath, and given to the Hindoo chiefs of Rajwara and Sirhind, and cannot be reclaimed. That which has been given away, cannot, according to the Hindoo legends, be given again. So thoroughly has this idea gained possession of the popular mind, that it is considered the strongest argument against the marriage of a widow, who having been once given away in marriage cannot become the object of a second gift. Lord Ellenborough will not disregard, in this instance, the force of popular prejudice, or mark his own efforts to gain popularity in the Hindoo community. On the whole, therefore, we are inclined to think that the proposal of our contemporary, to turn the Gates of Somnath into a pulpit for the Cathedral, while the Ningbo bell adorns the belfry, is not likely to be carried. The objections alike of the giver and the receiver are too serious to be overcome even by the force of his reasoning. The upshot will probably be, that Mr. Meara will be shocked to find his sweet-toned Christian bells, in such pagan company; that the old crumbling Sandal wood gates, if they do not go down to the sea as at Somnath, will remain in the Devan-see Ann at Agre, and that Bishop Wilson will procure a more substantial and elegant pulpit than any which could be manufactured out of them.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.—The Act for the abolition of Slavery passed Council on the 7th of April, the anniversary of the day on which the steps of Jellalabad were raised by its illustrious garrison; and every slave from Cape Comorin to the Himalays, among one eighth of the human race, has been legally set free. That which two years ago appeared hopeless, owing to the want of moral courage in those who ruled the empire, has been accomplished without noise or parade, but finally and effectually. America can no longer taunt us with hypocrisy in taking credit to ourselves for emancipating a million of slaves in the West Indies while we continued to hold another million, as it was said, in slavery in the East. Fully and honourably have we redeemed the pledge we offered to the Christian world ten years since, of making personal freedom co-extensive with the British dominions. We may now at length enjoy without qualification, the gratifying boast that wherever the British standard waves, it waves over freedom; and that slaves can no more breathe in our colonies, than they can breathe in our native land. We are now exulting over our successes in Afghanistan, in China, in Siam. Six times during the last twelve months have victories the most signal been announced by royal ministers. Almost every mail has brought out fresh rewards for the heroes who have maintained the military reputation of that country. Yet amidst all these trophies, the great victory we have gained in the cause of humanity over our own prejudices and lukewarmness, is perhaps—if our heroes will forgive the expression—a greater and more lasting object of national exultation. But it would be ungracious to institute any comparison between those noble exertions which have contributed to defend and consolidate the empire, and those less dazzling efforts which have restored liberty to the slave. Rather let us make it a matter of mutual congratulation that while some have been engaged in maintaining the honour of their country in the field, others have been no less diligently striving in the cabinet to secure for the subjects of this empire, that blessing of personal freedom which is at length identified with our political institutions; and thus the period at which we stood highest in the estimation of Asia, was that in which we declared universal freedom to every slave in India.

When the draft of this Act was first published, one of our contemporaries urged the necessity of completing the work, by attaching penalties to a breach of the law of emancipation. His reasoning on the subject was sound, and his suggestion highly judicious. Without penalties for infringing the act, its benevolent provisions may become a dead letter. Still, considering the circumstances under which the Act was framed, and the strong repugnance which was so recently manifested in high quarters to the immediate and unconditional extinction of slavery, it may have been a matter of prudence to confine the first act of legislation on this subject to a simple declaration that personal slavery should no longer exist legally in India. To have attempted more might have aroused opposition to the measure, not only on the part of the natives, but still more, among our own influential countrymen which would have been fatal to success. A great point has been gained by the decisive blow which has thus been inflicted on the institution of slavery. Some time must elapse before slavery itself will become entirely extinct in a country in which it has existed from time immemorial, and has been legalized by two successive dynasties of conquerors. To hasten this consummation it will be necessary to carry out the intentions of the legislature, by more stringent regulations, and to punish with severe penalties those who may attempt to evade them. That these regulations will not be withheld, as the necessity for them becomes more and more apparent, it would be unreasonable to doubt. When we compare the national agitation and the united efforts which were found necessary to effect the abolition of West India slavery, with the comparative absence of any pressure from without, in reference to its abolition in the east, the present measure has all the grace of a spontaneous movement in the cause of humanity. We may therefore look with greater confidence for the enactment of whatever laws may yet be necessary to complete the good work.

WEEKLY EPILOGUE OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 13.

—The reports of intelligence received from Simde both by way of Delhi and Bombay only serve to increase our anxiety for Sir Charles Napier and his brave army. The same goes which was played by the British when our army was advancing to Candahar has been played now. They have intercepted our posts. The Del-Mir Grande last received says, that there has been no communication between Upper and Lower Simde for fifteen days. There is no addition as yet to the intelligence brought by the Sandermat steamer to Bombay. It is certain that a battle has been fought in which we have been victorious, but the some of it is as yet unknown. Only the report of General Napier's death appears to be contradicted on good grounds. Letters are said to have been received from him after the battle; and one of these letters was in the hands of the commander of the Nimrod.

—A requisition, with a large number of very respectable Native signatures, with a small sprinkling of European names, has been presented to the Sheriff of Calcutta, requesting him to convene a meeting at the Tavern Hall on Tuesday next, with the view of forwarding to Mr. John Sallie an expression of the approbation and gratitude of the Native Inhabitants of Calcutta for his efforts given them the benefit of the 87th Clause of the present Charter, and to adopt a petition to the Court of Proprietors on the same subject.

—Mr. J. W. Alexander, the official Assignee of the Insolvent Court, has obtained two years leave of absence to visit England, leaving Mr. O'Dowd as his substitute. This, as the Star observes, the first instance in which an officer of the Supreme Court has been permitted to visit England without vacating his appointment. The officers of the Company's establishment, invariably lose office by going beyond the Cape. The voyage to England may now be performed in less time than a trip to the Cape, and it is possible that the Company's servants may be allowed to hold office while at home; but in this case it is far from improbable that their allowances will be subjected to a further reduction. It is partly in consideration of the long exile to which the members of the Civil Service were subjected, that their allowances were fixed at so high a scale; and there is reason to apprehend that the difficulties for visiting England have been thus multiplied, the handsome salaries may be curtailed.

—The last despatch from Burmah states, that the King has turned his attention to the growth of tea, and that he claims to himself a monopoly of the export. This royal competitor however will do little injury to the prospects of the Assam Tea Company. It is from the reduction in the price of tea which must necessarily result from the export of the article from the ports of the district in which it is grown in China, that the most formidable obstacles to the rising manufacture of Assam tea is to be expected.

FRIDAY, APRIL 14.

—Good Friday. The passengers of the Hindosteen were ordered to be punctually on board, two hours after midnight this morning; but an advertisement published yesterday, announced that in consequence of some injury which a part of the machinery had sustained, the departure of the vessel was postponed to to-morrow morning. The poorly disposed passengers had thus an opportunity of hearing the Archbishop's last lecture. It has been rumored that the Directors of the Oriental and Peninsular Company have it in contemplation to appoint a chaplain to each of their vessels.

—The Hindosteen steamer takes home Capt. David Lister Richardson, who has for several years filled the office of Principal of the Hindoo College, with much credit to himself and advantage to the pupils. We regret to hear that the cause of his departure is ill health. The students who have benefited by his labours, have addressed a very appropriate letter to him, and requested his acceptance of a small token of their esteem. We are happy to perceive this return of kindly feeling towards one who has laboured so sedulously for their good. For some time after his longest but intelligible interference to prevent meetings at the College in which the Government was assembled, he was exposed to a storm of abuse; but his departure for England appears to have created a revulsion of feeling in his favour. We hope he will find his health completely restored by the voyage.

—The papers of this morning give us no further intelligence from Scinde.

—A groom, who had been paid up his wages by Dr. Woodford and dismissed, brought an action against him in the Court of Requests for subsequent wages, which were not due. The case broke down under the evidence of the plaintiff's witness. Dr. W. expressed his surprise at the man's ingratitude, and the Commissioner delivered these words from the bench: "You must be a new convert, otherwise you would not be surprised at the ingratitude of native servants. Never expect gratitude from them. If it were possible that you could feed them with diamonds, still they would be ungrateful."

—The Mail dispatched from Bombay on the 1st of April, took 42,253 covers; viz. 22,000 letters and 10,253 covers. The Calcutta regular dark of the 23d was in time for it.

—A meeting has been held at Agra, at which it was resolved to establish an Agricultural and Horticultural Society for the North West Provinces. The motions which were made on the occasion will be found in another column.

—The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette has afforded amusement to his brother Editors at this Presidency by the following remarks:

"To plant our foot firmly in the Mofussil is one of our main and most choice objects. Only let the Mofussil become our forum, and we will sweep all India. We will bring wonderful things to light. Therefore let the gentlemen in the Mofussil respect the Gentleman's Gazette. In Bombay, we have as large a circulation as the Bombay Times." Surely this is not language to attract five thousand subscribers.

FRIDAY, APRIL 19.

—Early yesterday morning intelligence reached Calcutta of a glorious victory achieved by Sir Charles Napier after a severe struggle of three hours over an army of 22,000 Baluchas. For particulars, see our extracts.

—The Bombay papers state, that the Scinde Steamers, in her next trip will bring up the treasure found at Hyderabad, together with the Amers,—to be separated from that treasure for ever.

—The community of Bombay has split on the subject of a monument to preserve the memory of those who fell in Afghanistan and Scinde. The original proposal was for the erection of a monument. It was afterwards proposed to erect a Church at Colaba, and the Bishop of Calcutta, who happened to be there at the time of the meeting, gave his vote for the Church and subscribed largely to it. Those who originally intended to erect a monument, being outvoted, have convened a meeting for the purpose of carrying out their design, viz. that of erecting, in some conspicuous part of the Island of Bombay, on the Esplanade, if possible, a pillar, obelisk, or other monument of a similar character. A committee has been appointed to carry the resolution into effect; and it is not improbable that Bombay may have both the obelisk and the Church.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27.

—We have placed among our selections the plan proposed to the meeting of rate payers by Mr. Remfrey. There is little reason however to expect that they will be carried, or if carried, that the plan will maintain its ground. The meeting has none of the stamina necessary for a Municipal Committee, still less for one which has a new system to organize. The report of the meeting published in the journals winds up with saying: "Here various resolutions and amendments were proposed, discussed and abandoned, and so it would be merely waste of time and trouble to say more about them." To this we say, "ditto."

—A correspondent of the Anglo-Hindu States, in a letter published in this day's paper, that private individuals are now carrying out the production of Tea at about 50 per cent. less than the Company. We learn from the same source, that the Committee have adapted the London plan of paying its members for every attendance as a meeting, Sixteen Rupees. We hope this sum will come from the fines of absent members.

—The Criminal Sessions of the Supreme Court opened yesterday. There were only eleven cases on the Calendar, of which four had stood over from the last Sessions. There was but one Native on the Grand Jury, and the address of Sir Henry Stow was brief.

—The Bombay papers last received, give a very interesting account of the capture of Kerbelah, by the Pasha of Bagdad, which will be read with much interest. The defilement of the tomb of Abbas has roused the fanatic inhabitants of Persia to vengeance. The Shah of Persia is said to be making preparations for invading the Pashalik of Bagdad, and proclaiming war the Sultana Port. It is suspected that the religious difference which separates the Sheeah Persians from the Soneeh Turks, if it were to break out, give rise to the most revolting cruelties.

—We have copied an article from the Harbuz in reply to the remarks of the Bombay Times on the performance of the Hindustan Steamer. Our Calcutta contemporary denounces by its comments to the ascertained speed of this noble vessel, that supposing the Bombay Steamer to be of the same power, still we should in fair weather, receive all our letters and newspapers by the steamer at once and at a lower price, at the same time as which we receive the Express from Bombay, and that during the season in which the Bombay express is ten days on the route, the Hindustan, and her sister ships will bring our letters sooner than the express.

—The Star has furnished his readers with a very valuable Tabular Statement respecting the number of Coolies despatched to the Mauritius between the 24th of December 1842 and the 11th of April 1843, of which the following is an abstract:

The number of vessels employed	has been,	21
The aggregate tonnage	11,808
The Number of Male Coolies,	3,037
" " of Females,	478
" " of Children,	138

The emigrants have been sent in the following proportions by the Houses in Calcutta.

Mr. C. Jourdain,	1178
Messrs. Saunders, May, Sarkies and Co.,	881
Mr. C. Avington,	681
Messrs. Gillanders and Co.,	623
Messrs. Langlands and Co.,	472
Messrs. Adams, Scott and Co.,	547
Messrs. Smith, Ewing and Co.,	535
Mr. A. Gairdner,	102

SUNDAY, APRIL 18.

—5135 shares of Opium were sold yesterday at the Exchange and realized 37,760,400 Rs. If each chest stands Government in 300 Rupees, the profits on this sale amount to more than 20 lakhs of Rupees.

—A meeting of the rate payers in Calcutta was held on Saturday last. The object was to frame rules for taking over the municipal administration of the town from Government in conformity with an act passed two years ago. Several meetings had been previously held at which nothing was done. The present meeting was equally barren of any result. The affair has from the beginning been almost exclusively in the hands of natives, and the European part of the community has kept aloof. Mr. Remfrey, of the house of Hamilton and Co. is the only European who appears to have taken any interest in the matter.

—The Bombay Times reviewed this morning, holds out a dissent here that Col. Stoddard and Capt. Conolly may yet be bring. A Jew at London has heard from a brother of his at Balkh, that a Greek interpreter and slave, who had been for months confined in the same well with them, were taken out and executed, and that the prisoners were made to believe that they were Col. Stoddard and Capt. Conolly. The mind would surely embrace the slightest hope that our unfortunate countrymen were yet alive; but intelligence of their death has been received from so many quarters, and from sources so independent of each other, that we cannot indulge any hope of their existence.

—The Star has, in his number of this morning, exposed in full and severe terms the injustice which has been inflicted on Major Mackenzie, who was Assistant to the Political Agent at Loodianah long before the expedition to Afghanistan. His name is associated with the earliest efforts to open the navigation of the Indus. He has rendered important services to the state in his political capacity at Peshawar—but he was one of Lord Auckland's political, and he is now remembered in his corps, while another officer, brave it is true, but of recent fame, has been appointed Assistant to Mr. Clerk.

—At the last meeting of the Agricultural Society, of which a report is given elsewhere, a prospectus of Floricultural Society was put read. It appears in the Harbuz of this day. From all we can gather, it comes out under the auspices of Mr. Speede.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19.

—An Extra Delhi Gazette received yesterday evening, informs us that intelligence of Sir Charles Napier's victory had at length reached the station and Agra. The only addition we require to our intelligence is that the Amers previously to attacking the General, sent an Envoy to ask him to retire, taking six axes of the plunder of Hyderabad and leaving the other ten axes for him. It appears that the message was delivered just as the evening gun was fired, and Sir Charles is said to have exclaimed, "Take that as my reply."

Singular Meteoric Appearance.—A letter from Sibangar, dated April 7, says, "A very singular meteoric appearance was observed here a few evenings since. It occurred a little before 6 o'clock on the evening of the 8th. A very brilliant light suddenly illuminated the whole atmosphere, as on looking up, a large cluster of falling stars were seen rapidly descending towards the earth in an oblique direction. These disappeared in a few seconds, and about a minute afterwards a loud report was heard resembling that of a cannon, resulting doubtless from the explosion of the luminous mass. The report was heard also at Jaipur. Last evening at half past 8, we had several very severe shocks of an earthquake. The vibrations lasted for about five minutes. Another slight shock was felt at a quarter past one o'clock this morning."

—The Comet was not seen here until the 7th of March on account of cloudy weather. We were not able to discover the nucleus.

—Every thing is quiet on the frontier now—the Singphoo disturbances are considered to be at an end, and the parties sent into the hills have returned."

—We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India:—

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

ANOTHER GLORIOUS VICTORY NEAR HYDRABAD.

Times Office, 41 St. Mark St., April 6.

The Irish steamer, which came late harbouring at the morning tide, was captured by the British gunboats, and was taken by Sir Charles Napier over the Belonchoe on the 24th of March, the first remnant of which crushed us on the last instant. The General has been ordered to take the whole of his army, 6,000 men strong with eight guns, and to march upon the mountains by Sher Mahomed of Moorpoore. He has sent his forces, 20,000 strong, after a severe action, to the mountains, where they have completely dispersed. The whole of his force, 11 in number, are now gathered together with several of their standards. Sher Mahomed has camped into the desert with a body of horse. From this it is supposed he will speedily return to the mountains, and will be again surrounded by the irregular Horse. We have no time to give details. Our loss amounts to 30 killed, and 228 wounded. The brunt of the battle was borne by the 7th, 9th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 32nd, 33rd, 34th, 35th, 36th, 37th, 38th, 39th, 40th, 41st, 42nd, 43rd, 44th, 45th, 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 50th, 51st, 52nd, 53rd, 54th, 55th, 56th, 57th, 58th, 59th, 60th, 61st, 62nd, 63rd, 64th, 65th, 66th, 67th, 68th, 69th, 70th, 71st, 72nd, 73rd, 74th, 75th, 76th, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 87th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 93rd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 97th, 98th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 102nd, 103rd, 104th, 105th, 106th, 107th, 108th, 109th, 110th, 111th, 112th, 113th, 114th, 115th, 116th, 117th, 118th, 119th, 120th, 121st, 122nd, 123rd, 124th, 125th, 126th, 127th, 128th, 129th, 130th, 131st, 132nd, 133rd, 134th, 135th, 136th, 137th, 138th, 139th, 140th, 141st, 142nd, 143rd, 144th, 145th, 146th, 147th, 148th, 149th, 150th, 151st, 152nd, 153rd, 154th, 155th, 156th, 157th, 158th, 159th, 160th, 161st, 162nd, 163rd, 164th, 165th, 166th, 167th, 168th, 169th, 170th, 171st, 172nd, 173rd, 174th, 175th, 176th, 177th, 178th, 179th, 180th, 181st, 182nd, 183rd, 184th, 185th, 186th, 187th, 188th, 189th, 190th, 191st, 192nd, 193rd, 194th, 195th, 196th, 197th, 198th, 199th, 200th, 201st, 202nd, 203rd, 204th, 205th, 206th, 207th, 208th, 209th, 210th, 211th, 212th, 213th, 214th, 215th, 216th, 217th, 218th, 219th, 220th, 221st, 222nd, 223rd, 224th, 225th, 226th, 227th, 228th, 229th, 230th, 231st, 232nd, 233rd, 234th, 235th, 236th, 237th, 238th, 239th, 240th, 241st, 242nd, 243rd, 244th, 245th, 246th, 247th, 248th, 249th, 250th, 251st, 252nd, 253rd, 254th, 255th, 256th, 257th, 258th, 259th, 260th, 261st, 262nd, 263rd, 264th, 265th, 266th, 267th, 268th, 269th, 270th, 271st, 272nd, 273rd, 274th, 275th, 276th, 277th, 278th, 279th, 280th, 281st, 282nd, 283rd, 284th, 285th, 286th, 287th, 288th, 289th, 290th, 291st, 292nd, 293rd, 294th, 295th, 296th, 297th, 298th, 299th, 300th, 301st, 302nd, 303rd, 304th, 305th, 306th, 307th, 308th, 309th, 310th, 311th, 312th, 313th, 314th, 315th, 316th, 317th, 318th, 319th, 320th, 321st, 322nd, 323rd, 324th, 325th, 326th, 327th, 328th, 329th, 330th, 331st, 332nd, 333rd, 334th, 335th, 336th, 337th, 338th, 339th, 340th, 341st, 342nd, 343rd, 344th, 345th, 346th, 347th, 348th, 349th, 350th, 351st, 352nd, 353rd, 354th, 355th, 356th, 357th, 358th, 359th, 360th, 361st, 362nd, 363rd, 364th, 365th, 366th, 367th, 368th, 369th, 370th, 371st, 372nd, 373rd, 374th, 375th, 376th, 377th, 378th, 379th, 380th, 381st, 382nd, 383rd, 384th, 385th, 386th, 387th, 388th, 389th, 390th, 391st, 392nd, 393rd, 394th, 395th, 396th, 397th, 398th, 399th, 400th, 401st, 402nd, 403rd, 404th, 405th, 406th, 407th, 408th, 409th, 410th, 411th, 412th, 413th, 414th, 415th, 416th, 417th, 418th, 419th, 420th, 421st, 422nd, 423rd, 424th, 425th, 426th, 427th, 428th, 429th, 430th, 431st, 432nd, 433rd, 434th, 435th, 436th, 437th, 438th, 439th, 440th, 441st, 442nd, 443rd, 444th, 445th, 446th, 447th, 448th, 449th, 450th, 451st, 452nd, 453rd, 454th, 455th, 456th, 457th, 458th, 459th, 460th, 461st, 462nd, 463rd, 464th, 465th, 466th, 467th, 468th, 469th, 470th, 471st, 472nd, 473rd, 474th, 475th, 476th, 477th, 478th, 479th, 480th, 481st, 482nd, 483rd, 484th, 485th, 486th, 487th, 488th, 489th, 490th, 491st, 492nd, 493rd, 494th, 495th, 496th, 497th, 498th, 499th, 500th, 501st, 502nd, 503rd, 504th, 505th, 506th, 507th, 508th, 509th, 510th, 511th, 512th, 513th, 514th, 515th, 516th, 517th, 518th, 519th, 520th, 521st, 522nd, 523rd, 524th, 525th, 526th, 527th, 528th, 529th, 530th, 531st, 532nd, 533rd, 534th, 535th, 536th, 537th, 538th, 539th, 540th, 541st, 542nd, 543rd, 544th, 545th, 546th, 547th, 548th, 549th, 550th, 551st, 552nd, 553rd, 554th, 555th, 556th, 557th, 558th, 559th, 560th, 561st, 562nd, 563rd, 564th, 565th, 566th, 567th, 568th, 569th, 570th, 571st, 572nd, 573rd, 574th, 575th, 576th, 577th, 578th, 579th, 580th, 581st, 582nd, 583rd, 584th, 585th, 586th, 587th, 588th, 589th, 590th, 591st, 592nd, 593rd, 594th, 595th, 596th, 597th, 598th, 599th, 600th, 601st, 602nd, 603rd, 604th, 605th, 606th, 607th, 608th, 609th, 610th, 611th, 612th, 613th, 614th, 615th, 616th, 617th, 618th, 619th, 620th, 621st, 622nd, 623rd, 624th, 625th, 626th, 627th, 628th, 629th, 630th, 631st, 632nd, 633rd, 634th, 635th, 636th, 637th, 638th, 639th, 640th, 641st, 642nd, 643rd, 644th, 645th, 646th, 647th, 648th, 649th, 650th, 651st, 652nd, 653rd, 654th, 655th, 656th, 657th, 658th, 659th, 660th, 661st, 662nd, 663rd

CORRIGER OFFICE, 1½ P. M.
We have just received intelligence from Hyderabad, which we hasten to lay before our readers—we have no time for comment.

Four miles from Hyderabad, 25th March.
The report that the enemy were coming to meet us proved correct, for after the arrival of the 8th

g. and 3d Cavalry on the 23d instant, we marched on the following day, and after we had passed the Town of Hyderabad about 2 miles, our guns were heard opening upon our advanced guard, and in an hour from that time we were all drawn up in front of the enemy.

men and a battery and then we advanced in Echelon of Battalions in line, H. M. 22d first, then H. M. 21st N. I., 12th, 8th, and 1st Grenadiers last of all. The 8th and Grenadiers were well engaged, and the brunt of the action lay in their hands, and the right of the Enemy's position was downed, and the remaining from it. The Cavalry turned the position in beautiful style on their right, whilst we advanced in front. They did not stand very long in the Nallah and Village, but we lost an awful number of men, for we received orders not to fire until we came close to the Nallah; when however we opened our fire and charged, they began to bolt excepting a few who gallantly charged us and were killed in our ranks.

We have lost 214 killed and wounded but not very honorable to ascertain cordially the aims of the enemy's loss. In our Nakhla, we counted no less than 231 dead bodies, and the dead all dying are scattered all over the country. It is very sad to see many have disappeared, but we are not so foolish as to think that we have killed them all. We expect to meet some slight opposition there, but it will not be long as the Belouches are discouraged.

Fort Maitland, 23rd March.

We have had another fight about six miles from this and gained a victory. The enemy have been pierced and the Army going to turn him and destroy the place, after which they are to turn him. Our loss has been heavy again, especially H. 22nd Regt., the left wing of which was much cut to pieces. I have not yet received the right wing of H. 22nd Regt.'s position, but I have not lost much, particularly as I left the Camp as soon as the lie of the war was over. Captain Garbutt of the 10th Buffs was killed, and several of the 10th Buffs and artillery were killed, and several of the 10th Buffs were dangerously wounded. —London Times Extra.

[FROM THE BOMBAY COURIER EXTRA.]

We issued an extra early in the day, containing Extracts from two letters which we had received, when a communication has been made to us from a highly informed quarter, which induced our suscepting the Editor of the Extra, which you hope has been the means of clearing up the matter, and this must be our apology, that we have no time pursuing an error, when discovered. Our information was derived from a person who had been acquainted with the late General, and who had acquainted Grenadiers, who were stated by him to be the cause of the late General's death. We are very much obliged to you for the information which you have given us, and we are very much obliged to you to have been engaged in all. We believe the fact to be, that the late Grenadiers were the cause of the late General's death, and the General in consequence of the movement the enemy, saw reason to change his plan on the 1st of June, and the first necessarily led to the same last, and the last. It is very much to be regretted however in the action, and their commander and their Commander's has been much more than necessary, and the great great satisfaction as many of our friends in the Regt. will readily believe.

"Yesterday the 24th we gained a splendid victory. We marched from Hyderabad yesterday morning and had not advanced more than two miles and a half before the enemy were discovered 11 mile in advance of us, drawn up in a tremendously strong position, we advanced to within 200, or 1300 yards, when the troops were drawn up in order of battle as follows, the enemy fired round shot at us all the time.

Left.	Right.
Poona Horse, 9th Bengal Cavalry, H. M.	21st, 12th, N. I., & P.
22nd, Hutt's Battery, 2nd Light Inf.	Battery, 8th N. I.
Hewitson's, 24th N. I.	Granadier, Horse Artillery 3rd Bomb Coy., Scinde Horse

The above was our 1st position, and when formed up W. and myself and B. rode forward and examined the enemy's position which we saw was very strong especially in their right which rested on a village and dry bed of the river.

We three galloped along their whole line about the distance of 300 yards and received the fire of their guns and matchlocks by which we found out their strength. We made the report to Sir CHARLES, and immediately he advanced about 400 yards when he halted and ordered the Horse Artillery to move from the right of the Grenadiers to the left of II. M. 22nd and about 9 o'clock, after having sustained the enemy fire for two hours our guns opened and made the enemy very soon abandon their guns, the line then advanced to the assault and a devil of a fight took place which lasted for two hours and then we had strategies was going on the whole of the avillente. We took up their position and fired grape and shot into the village and drove the enemy out with considerable slaughter. While in our second position the enemy's horse troops proper retreated and our 3rd Cavalry charged splendidly over mud and rain, and cut up great many of the Scindian horse and killed the same. When we had captured the whole of the enemy's position and advanced beyond the village the Poonia Horse and 9th Bengal Cavalry were ordered to charge. We, and six went with them and followed them in the mullas for upwards of two miles slaying a great many, the 9th Bengal Cavalry followed us when the Poonia Horse had cleared the way. I believe they got an Officer

[illegible]

We are now pitched on the field of battle, this morning I went to look in the Nullahs and the dead lying in heaps as we left; thus they lay exactly as they were all burning, cannot fancy a more horrible sight. At a clock yesterday afternoon we got our loads off the worst part of all took three hours of the day. The 2nd killed 21 and last night two more of their wounds and several more mortally wounded. Two officers killed on the field, Garrett, of 6th Cavalry and Smith, II. A. Several of wounded, among those Burr and Peanish severely. It is terrible work for troops at such places, and requires a great general guidance in troops. I don't think English could possibly do it better than we have done or portion of your trust attributed to their right.

Altogether the general is justly proud of the results of the battle, but of course much regrets the loss of the poor unfortunate but gallant 22 who certainly sustained the brunt of the battle. Notand Belboch was spared, the soldiers shot & bayoneted them in such a manner as is well witnessed. The General's Dispatch goes this ad-

The enemy are said to have dispersed and Amir SHAH MANOHAR fled to Meerpoor, we march after him to-morrow, in order of battle, and shall be at him three days hence, if he does not go before. He hangs the Bellicehes up by the eyes which makes them so desperate.—— by Courier Extra.

“My Dear Sir,—Letters in from Hyderabad, today and yesterday mention that Sir Charles Vakeel gained another pitched battle over the Amoy. From what I can learn, the Amoy of Mei-yang quietly sent a Vakeel to Sir Charles to say that he would repair to the Residency at Hyderabad and receive a British Resident there, provided Sir Charles's Force was withdrawn to Sukkur; Vakeel made his proposal just before the evening gun fired, and Sir Charles's reply was “I will consider the Answer by THAT,” pointing to the gun.

A fight accordingly took place near Hyderabad and we are said to have lost 300 in killed and wounded, three Officers killed, one of them Lieut-Colonel, the enemy are said to have lost 1,700 dead on the field. Bravo-simo! this reopened the communication with Sukkur.

The names of the officers killed are mentioned with the exception of the Lieut.-Colonel. The enemy said to have been 17,000 strong. The four eighteen pounders, and two heavy siege howitzers for Scinde, arrived at the station this morning."—Dellis Gazette Eschmordina April 11.

any of those efforts which aim at the real happiness of the people. To see any number, however small, of the native community coming forward in such a cause would be indeed refreshing. We speak of the native community, because should they survive in the master the Government might be induced to make some concessions in their consolidations; but should they not attempt anything, or unite in any effort, if begun by others, to effect the abolition of the cruelties of the Charak, then at all events and under any circumstances, we call upon our Christian friends to take in this matter, originating their resources from the Scriptures, and to oppose the Sau idolatry and the Government connection with idolatry.—*The Cal. AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY

The usual Monthly Meeting of the Agricultural and Horticultural Society, took place yesterday. The Hon'ble President not being present, the Chair was taken by the Vice President, Mr. C. K. Hobson.

The Secretary read the minutes of the last meeting, which were confirmed.

A letter was read, which had been addressed to the Government by the President of the Society, pointing out the great loss that would be sustained by the Society, by the withdrawal of the privilege of free postage, which was formerly allowed. The reply from Government to this letter was also read, and contained a loonomic refusal of the President.

Another Government letter was read containing an extract from a recent despatch of the Court of Directors, in which the usefulness of the Society is favourably noticed, and a promise made of future assistance, with regard to the transmission of seeds to the Society from England.

A Communication was read, containing favorable accounts of the prosperous condition of the Lucknow Garden.

There were a great number of presentations and samples on the table, and these were in the usual manner disposed of. They will be noticed at large in the Honorary Secretary's report.

The report of the Cattle Committee, on the expediency of discontinuing the premiums lately granted by the Society for improving the breed of Cattle, was brought forward and read to the Society. The Committee were of opinion, that those premiums should not continue, on the ground that the results were not sufficiently important to render such outlay necessary. They further suggested, that a year hence would be the best time for withdrawing such premiums, as the Society's exclusive engagements extend to that time.

The report drew the attention of the members to another subject of importance; namely, granting premiums for improving the wool produced in this country. The subject was referred back to the Committee for them to furnish a schedule and scale of the premiums they propose, together with the different qualities of wool for which competition ought to be encouraged.

The next was a question of very considerable importance. It was the motion relating to the proposed increase of subscription.

Mr. Speed formally resumed the motion, and thought that though the meeting was thinly attended, the question should be determined upon as it had been standing over for a long time, and it seemed to excite little interest at present.

Mr. Hume, the Secretary, remarked that the reason for which an increased rate of subscription had been called for, has since been obviated by the Committee of papers undertaking the management of the new Journal. He further stated that, in order to be enabled to employ the services of a paid Editor, it may also be necessary to carry on the proposed augmentation of subscription. But as at present no such reason existed, and he therefore considered that the proposed increase was unnecessary, he further remarked, that notwithstanding as much had been made of the question when originally mooted, that it would strike at the very roots of the Society, &c. &c., it was thought that the subject would not be brought forward again. However, although the motion had stood over so long, so few had attended at the different meetings to determine upon the question. He requested the members to be present at the next meeting, which was arranged for the 10th inst. Mr. Speedie, who was present, with one more speaker.*

The motion as adopted stood, as follows, and may be added, that besides the Vice Presidents, Secretaries, and Members of the Finance Committee, there was only one other member present when it was carried:—

"That the funds of the society not appearing to require at present the increased subscription of eight pence annually, proposed for the support of the Monthly Journal, that being met by the arrangement so kindly made by the committee of papers, without expence, the former rate of subscriptions of two gold mohurs be reverted to."

The second meeting of the Fruit and Kitchen Garden Committee having been held, the result of their proceedings was brought forward for consideration. This was a schedule enumerating the fruits for which premiums are proposed to be held out, the amount and distribution of those premiums, and other details to carry out the proposed object. As this proposition made by the Fruit and Kitchen Garden Committee, involved a money question, it was determined to refer the subject for the Finance Committee's Report and determine upon it at the next month's meeting.

Before the meeting broke up, the Prospectus of a Floricultural Society was handed round to those present, a reprint of which will be found in another place. In reference to this subject Mr. Speede gave notice of a motion to be disposed of at the next meeting, to the effect that the Agricultural Society, should encourage the project of a Floricultural Society, by aiding it in its infancy.—Beng. Herald, April 14.

3. Divisional Committees shall meet once a week, where rate-payers or their proxies, may attend and make suggestions, and if not adopted any six of them may call a meeting of the whole rate-payers of the division to decide thereon within five days; nevertheless the Committee may appeal to the General Municipal Committee if public convenience, expense, or health is concerned.

9. Each of the Commissioners, or Division Committee men, shall be vested with the power of a special Constable, for authority in the exercise of his commission, or in aid of the public peace; and in the absence of any of the Police Magistrates, his authority shall be obeyed by Tharadars, Chowkidars and Constables, but responsibility shall attach to the authority nevertheless.

are desirous of forming a department of Civil Engineering. Their duties divide themselves into two departments.

1. The Madras University. This was established in April 1861 for imparting instruction in the higher branches of Literature, Philosophy and Science. No pupils are admissible but such as are able to read and write the English language intelligibly. The management is under Government, some of whom shall be Native Hindus or Mohammedans; the appointment of the rest is vested with the Governor in Council. Seven hours daily are spent in study. The monthly school fee is four Rupees.

One great object is to attract youths from the more respectable families. The number of pupils amounts to one hundred. Many leave with their education imperfect for the purpose of obtaining situations in Government and other offices. The course of instruction comprises Natural Philosophy, Moral Philosophy, Abstracts, Composition, Translation, &c. The rules respecting punishments are good. "The Head Master alone shall have authority to award corporal punishment—which is never to be inflicted on the same day that it is awarded and is to be confined to boys under 14 years of age." We are glad to find that one student passed an examination in the study of Locke on the Human Understanding. It is satisfactory to find that the Mathematical mania, which actuates the system of instruction in Bengal, had not spread to Madras. At the express recommendation of Lord Elphinstone a Medical College and College of Engineers have been established in connection with the University. The example and success of the Calcutta Medical College has emboldened them, though the peculiar low state of industrial cultivation throughout the Native community of Madras is a discouragement. The qualifications for matriculation are not high, being a knowledge of English, Geography and the Elements of Natural Philosophy. It professes to found a Medical School of the same quality in principle, as the Medical Colleges in Europe, although with inferior means. A College of Civil Engineers is also proposed to be instituted. Benefits are expected to flow from it "with reference to the general and necessary use of scientific knowledge, the improvement and improvements in arts and manufactures, the stagnation of the fiscal resources of the country, from inability successfully to carry out public works through the want of Native professionals." The nature of the climate renders Native, when situated, the best agents in this work, as they can suffer exposure to all weathers. There is no deficiency of talent or ability in the Native character. In the present state of India Engineering studies are of vital importance. The branches to be taught are, the pure Mathematics, Surveying, Drawing, Geology. In filling up vacancies in public situations in the Surveying, Engineering or Building departments, a preference is to be given, ceteris paribus, to the students of this College. The Committee also propose founding a class for Jurisprudence and the study of Law, in order to qualify Natives for better service according to their faculties. The study of law as a science would thus improve the administration of justice generally. The measure has been advocated by Lord Auckland.

2. The Formation of Branch Provincial Institutions. These are to be connected with the Madras University & they are designed to provide education for the superior classes of the Provincial community. Considerable mal has been awakened among influential members of the Native community in the provinces to encourage and support establishments of this kind. Societies have been formed for this purpose at several principal towns, and particularly at Mangalore, at Bellary and at Cuddalore. The Government purpose organizing four. Instructions to be imparted in the English and Vernacular languages. The Government co-opted servants at the station along with five Natives are to constitute the Local Committee, to meet monthly, so the Master of the Institution is not a Member; we hope this will be altered. The Judge of the Provincial Court is to be the special visitor.

3. Education tests. The Board have unanimously decided upon "the expediency of requiring all Natives and others to pass an educational examination before they are admitted into the public service." By this they assume essential service will be rendered to the Government by securing qualified agents and that a stimulus will also be lent to the Natives for diligence in study. Integrity of character and aptitude for business will be also taken into account; at the present it will only be applied as a right of preference, ceteris paribus. No favour will be shown to the alumni of Government institutions above others. In the present condition of the Natives, self-interest will be the chief prompter to the acquisition of knowledge. A board of Examiners is to be constituted for conducting the proposed test examinations. Abhorrence on the Moral Feelings, Blackstones's Commentaries and the New Testament for Christians form part of the subjects.

4. Vernacular Class Books. The Board does not quite accord with the recommendations of Lord Auckland respecting the early preparation of Vernacular Class books, by means of translations. They consider that these translations make the acquisition of much more knowledge than Natives can be supposed to possess—that the Vernacular languages are deficient in corresponding terms for abstract and scientific words—that, as in the higher departments of Literature and Science, instruction is imparted through the medium of the English language, few translations need be compiled for the use of the students of this grade, who would have access to the whole range of English knowledge. The Board give their opinion that "only those works which deal in simple narrative in which little occasion arises for the use of abstract terms—which relate palpable occurrences, sometimes surprising, sometimes interesting to the feelings—appear to admit of efficient translation. It has been testified on credible authority, that a translation by two European gentlemen (of familiar learning in Maharashtra) and one Native Marathi scholar, of Lord Brougham's treat on the objects, advantages, and pleasures of Science, is not only unintelligible to Marathi readers, but that it actually became so, after five or six years, to the Marathi Translator himself." It has appeared to the Board that the course to be encouraged is that of a full and free exposition, rather than a translation, of all the subject matter contained in any English work, by the assistance of, or entirely by, such Natives as have attained a full comprehension of that subject matter, and also a proficiency in the English language. Whatever can be accomplished through paraphrase and through explanatory notes, to remedy deficiencies in the Vernacular language, should be attempted.

From a consideration of this Report it appears, how little has been effected by the Madras Government towards the promotion of Education; the grant by Government for educational purposes in 1841 amounted to 35,000 Rupees; less than the salary of a single Civilian! In 1859 the Company derived a revenue of four and a half millions (shortly from this Presidency and they expend about the 1-1400th part in education! Three since Madras was finally ceded to the English in 1786 by the expulsion of Count Dally, has education progressed! Madras well deserves the epithet of the "brightest Presidency." Let Mr. Thompson point the attention of the Natives to the defective state of their education, and he will render essential service to the community.

THE ONE OBJECT ON WHICH THE FRIENDS OF INDIA SHOULD CONCENTRATE THEIR EFFORTS.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I observe that the Indian Association seems to think that it is from England that justice to India is mainly to be expected; but I fear that a country will not generally take an efficient interest in the welfare of a remote people whose interests are not rather closely coincident with its own; nor does the past experience of the relations between India and England seem to encourage a better hope; for let it be remarked, that the moral constitution of the English is not so entirely different from what it was when the British Parliament sanctioned even the worst measures of Warren Hastings, and even the cruel and cold blooded plunder and slaughter of the Rohillas; nor is much hope of that public indignation which is sought for to be derived from a consideration of the manner in which public writers even now comment on those cruel and cruel Acts of Policy as evincing "facility of conscience," and from their ascribing the worst crimes not to the criminals, but to the circumstances of their times; a modern mode of judging which threatens to confound all distinction between rectitude and the utmost criminality of conduct.

The truth is, that England is precisely in that state of civilisation wherein intellectual excitement is substituted for moral excitement, and wherein the spirit of compromise neutralises whatever better spirit there may be.

I altogether think that the Association is looking to the wrong quarter; and to one where everything is carried on by compromise and influence derived from interest; but that influence which prevails even the boldest denouncers of the wrong they allege from denouncing the doers of the wrong, and from blaming any one but the public—which tantamount to blaming no one whatever.

Against an influence which can produce such marvellous forbearance in even the denouncers of the system, no association can prevail; and therefore the only hope for India seems to consist in transferring some of the influence to those whom service it will be to apply and promote the proper remedies; and the only mode of doing this seems to consist in including the interested party—namely, the people of India with their consequent influence—in the now one-sided administration.

To this one object I would therefore wish to see the undivided energy of the association and their organs applied. It is the object which can be combined with most grace and which can be urged with least danger of turbulence, for it is one in which the populace are not likely to take an active part; it is also an object of good—which seems to include all others; and lastly, it is an object the advocates of which are unlikely to be opposed by voluminous papers and other means of mystification.

If the Native influence sets through the administration, it will not gradually—steadily—and constitutionally; and the advancement of national right will be a national development instead of a mere metropolitan irruption or a Mad Vernacular which latter will I fear be the result if the association continue to advocate special and metropolitan interests instead of concentrating all their energy on the one national object of obtaining for the Natives a legitimate influence in the administration.

I believe that until this is done, every law or order will as far as makes against the favoured class be perverted or evaded as are the law declaring natives eligible to high offices and the order requiring due qualification in languages for the European who is to assume office. I, in short fully believe that no substantial and national good will be effected till we have nationalised the administration—and in so doing placed influence where it will be used—not only for the good of a dominant caste, but for the good of the people.

Yours,

CAMPBELL.

* The defect urged below the Court of Proprietors on this subject is, that the Natives are treated with the highest judicial cases; but if they are treated highly what protest have we for not promoting these highly.

his banners, in which he forcibly urged them to take an active share in the eminently Christian work of Missions. The last lecture was delivered in the spacious church of "La Madeleine," which was crowded to overflowing. It is calculated that upwards of three thousand persons were present. The anxiety thus evinced by the population to assist in the work of this nature is a happy pleasing omen, and leads one to expect the harvest fruits for the future. Mr. Lacroix's taking pains was peculiarly solemn and affecting; and his sermon was audibly, by the evident tone of sensibility they manifested, showed the high value they placed on the instruction they had been privileged to receive from the Missionary, as well as the ardent anxiety to pre-achristianize him for the last time. The president of the Committee of Missions then rose, and publicly thanked Mr. Lacroix, in the name of the clergy and people of Geneva, for the good he had been the means of doing among them. In doing this, his flattering voice, and the tears which nearly prevented his utterance, testified more eloquently than his words how deeply he felt on this solemn occasion. We sincerely hope that the salutary impressions which Mr. Lacroix has left in the hearts of our population will prove a lasting blessing to Geneva.—From the Federal de Geneve.

THE NON-INTERFERENCE QUESTION.—Do we then, it may be asked, mean to deny this principle of English law, which renders a Christian minister liable to penalties for the due and conscientious discharge of his spiritual functions, and which compels him to perform spiritual acts in obedience to secular authority? Because the Church of England is reduced to this state of ignominious bondage to the Civil Power, does that form any reason that we should withhold our acknowledgment so earthly Head, should be deprived of her legislative independence and freedom of action in matters spiritual?

Our reply shall be frank and explicit. It is our deliberate conviction, that no Ecclesiastical Establishment can exist upon other conditions, without danger to the liberties of the subject, as well as to the public weal. Every subject of a free Government has a right to claim full and complete protection at the hands of the Civil Magistrate, against any wrong or injury done to him on any pretence whatever; and that protection would not be complete, were he liable to wrong or injury, at the command of the spiritual acts of the clergy—those acts having been rendered by law necessary to his enjoyment of any civil rights. Unless all consequences followed from the performance of one two functions, no such protection would be complete, and no ground would then exist for the interpretation of the State. But, as soon as the supposition of an Ecclesiastical Establishment, and the spiritualities of a Church, a man becomes liable to loss or injury in his civil interests, upon grounds of which the law takes no cognizance; alleged offences against order or discipline, become a ground for the deprivation of which, therefore, must be contrary to law—a wrong done, for which the State is bound to provide a remedy.

Let us get by way of illustration. Let it be supposed, for a moment, that the Ministers of Dissenting churches were employed and authorized by the State to perform certain acts which should be a prerequisite for the enjoyment of any civil rights appertaining to the members of that church; that no minister chosen by a congregation as their pastor, could be admitted to the pulpit, or claim an interest any endowment, unless he were first ordained by certain Reverend Clergymen, and received a license—would we say that Dissenting Ministers should be liable to an action for damages for refusing to certify that he is ordained under such a license? Obviously, no.

The moment that Dissenting Ministers are invested with functions involving a delegated authority or power, we will pay that their hands may be tied, and will claim a remedy against them.

Dissenting Ministers are Eminent, and Dissenting congregations are composed of fallible men; they are, therefore, in the consequences of discharge of their religious duties, and their rights, is the glory of the Voluntary Principle, upon which the apostolic churches of unadorned Protestantism are founded, that no member of them is liable to civil wrong, as the consequence of his acting as a spiritual offender. If denied the privilege of religious communion, he sustains thereby no civil injury. Ecclesiastical inflictions upon him are civil penalties, and injustice exercised towards him carries with it its own remedy, by losing all its punitive force. He whose kingdom is not of this world, has committed to the hands of his ministers neither sword nor the keys of jurisdictional power. The prince of the Gentiles craves dominion and authority over them; but he does not so to us among you. Nor is it so, where the Christian law of Christendom is adhered to; and Christianity is not unsuited for those States.

COMPARATIVE LITERATURE OF AMERICAN CHURCHES.—The New York Evangelist gives the following as the result of an investigation of the amount given by the several religious denominations, for the spread of the Gospel. The Baptists, now, in this country, give about twenty-five cents per Member; the thirty-five cents; Episcopalian, fifty cents; Presbyterians, seventy-five cents; Congregationalists, one dollar.—Specie Review.

REPORT ON AUSTRIA.—It appears, from a recent statistical return, that there are, in Austria and its dependencies, including its Italian territory, 25,500,000 Catholics, 3,500,000 members of the United Church, 2,000,000 of the Non-Aligned, 1,250,000 Lutherans, 2,340,000 of the Reformed Church, 45,000 Societies, and 600,000 Jews. The number of religious houses for men amounts to 748, comprising 10,351 persons, and including 27 religious orders. The Brothers of Mercy possess 34 houses and 543 inmates; the Benedictines 27, and 1,093 inmates; the Capuchins 37, and 1,293 inmates. There are 157 convents, containing 3,561 inmates.—Pat.

WICKLIFF'S ISLAND.

PITCAIRN'S ISLAND.—A letter in the Hampshire Telegraph contains a full account of a late visit to this island by H. M. frigate Carpus. Most of the officers were enabled to land, and were received by its interesting inhabitants with that welcome which they are ever ready to afford to those who have the opportunity of visiting them; indeed, the arrival of the Carpus was most opportune, for they had been labouring under a severe epidemic, which the kind exertions of the Surgeon, together with a supply of medicines presented to them by Captain Jones, tended much to alleviate. On the second day, they were presented with the stores sent them by Her Majesty's Government, consisting of a supply of arms and ammunition, spades, iron kettles, &c., receiving, at the same time, an address from Captain Jones, in which, after giving them all the credit due for their heroic conduct, he admonished them to continue in the same quiet and peaceable way, as any deviation would withdraw from them the support of Her Majesty's Government. They have increased in number to 14; the oldest person on the island being the wife of Christian, the chief of the natives, and one of those Oahuans, who sailed in the Bounty from Oahu to Pitcairn's Island; she perfectly recollects the landing of Captain Cook at Oahu.

QUESTIONS.—The Carpus afterwards visited this island. It was here that Captain Cook lost his life, and the only monument which marks the spot on which he fell, is the stump of an old coco-nut tree, with a slab of copper nailed on it some years ago by H. M. S. Jaeger. An old gray-headed native, who lived in a hut close to the spot, intimated to some of the officers that he was present at the tragical event, and actually went through a kind of pantomimic representation of the whole scene—the first attack with stones—the retreat of Cook to the beach—the death, the fear of the natives when the ship fell upon them, which he exemplified by falling down and creeping upon his belly behind the nearest bush, and then the resting and eating of the body on a hill out of the reach of the shot. The representation was too perfect to admit of a doubt as to his having been an eye-witness, if not an actor in the business. A large party of the officers visited the famous volcano of Kiridani, situated about twenty miles from the anchorage, and being the largest and in the most active state of any of the volcanoes of the circumference. The crater was covered about thirteen or fourteen miles, and its depth a thousand feet below the level of the surrounding plain, from which it appears to have at once sunk perpendicularly down. They descended, with a guide, into the great crater, and after walking over some miles of its uneven surface, arrived at a lake of red burning lava, of at least three miles in circumference; and, on the summit of the lava, the ship's light burned with the excretion, and deeming themselves amply repaid for all the inconvenience and severe labour they had undergone on their journey.

ASTRONOMY.—A mechanician of a little town in Bohemia, says the Constitutionnel, has constructed an automaton which imitates perfectly the human voice, particularly in singing. It is a large wooden figure, built with the greatest accuracy. Shakes, runs, and chromatic scales are all executed with surprising precision. This automaton, in singing, even produces certain words, so as to be easily understood.—Athenaeum.

STRAW BURNED DREAD, A LA VICTORIA.—It has been known for some time at Vienna that if the heart of an oven be cleaned with a moistened wisp of straw, brushed therewith immediately afterwards, presents a much better appearance, the oven having a beautiful yellow tint. It was thence inferred that this peculiarity must be attributed to the vapour which is exhaled from the straw of the oven, fell back on the bread, and

At Paris, in order to secure with certainty so desirable an appearance, the following arrangement is resorted to.—The heart of the oven is held on a wire inclined plane, and is raised about 11 inches in three feet, and the arch roof is built lower at the end nearest the door, so compared with the furthest extremity. When the oven is charged, the entrance is closed with a wet bundle of straw. By this arrangement the steam is driven down on the bread, and a golden yellow crust is given to the loaf, as if it had been previously covered with the yolk of an egg.—Annals of Chimney.

DISAPPOINTED EXPECTATIONS OF PERRAULT.—There are a section of Poel's majority, who have been clamouring for places and prizes, who have commenced declamatory openly that they have nothing by their support of him. Of two who thus speak I am well aware—they are Sir Francis Duntlett and Sir Charles Coote, who demand, in reward for their overbearing subordination of Liberal principles, the poeasies which through political life they have both so early sought, and which the Whites, while in office, refused to bestow upon them. There are several others in the same position; and although they will not directly support the Opposition, yet they say that they will not, as before, come to the rescue of Poel, should he be placed in a dilemma.—Hunts Independent.

A MATRILIAL RETIRED.—Captain Nowlan, a guardian of the poor, and a member of the Poor Law Board, holding a high station in society, has allowed his mother to remain a pauper in the workhouse. He had lately visited and paid for her support, but still left her to the care of a new sister, who had been placed in a cheap boarding-house for her maintenance. It has been ascertained, that the mother of five other substantial citizens are in the house; and Captain Nowlan intends to persuade them all in an open carriage through the town, and have them at the doors of their unfeeling children.—Pat.

THE DEAN OF PETERBOROUGH.—On Monday last in the forenoon, a young woman, residing in the parish of Milton, who had been employed by the Dean, threw herself into the Northampton arm of the Grand Junction Canal, a little above Milton-bridge. Most providentially (as nobody else was at hand) the Dean of Peterborough (Dr. Glynne), who was rising from Guyton to Northampton, arrived at that point just in time to witness her last struggles, and as she sank brought her surface. He immediately sprang into the water, and was fortunate enough to rescue her from what would have been a miserable state, before life was extinct. After some time, having obtained assistance, he had her conveyed to the Navigation Inn, at no great distance from the spot, where, under the care of a medical gentleman, she recovered to animation, and is now doing well. We understand that the cause of her rash conduct was distress of mind, aggravated by some sharp words which had passed between her and an acquaintance of her own sex. We are happy to learn that the Dean, notwithstanding the severity of the cold and the length of time that he was in the water, has suffered no inconvenience.—Northampton Herald.

PETERBURY, JAN. 15.—The wind having moderated and gone round to the north, the position of the stranded Irish is somewhat improved in reference to saving their cargoes. The cargo of the Seawitch is valued at about 35,000*l.* At the time of stranding she had on board several horses, two of which were safely landed yesterday. Her captain states, that when she went ashore on Friday her chains parted one after the other with a noise similar to the report of a double-barrelled gun. A small portion of the Southampton's cargo was brought ashore yesterday; the whole is valued at 15,000*l.* The Seawitch lies in a dangerous position; her bows are fast in the mud, and are damaged by the brigs Esquimaux driving against her when disengaging her anchors. The brigs were saved, but the brig Esquimaux was the only one to escape. One time very perilous, and but her crews were kept ready to cut away her masts. This harp is bound to Calcutta, and it is stated that she has specie to the value of 150,000*l.* aboard, and 30 tons of Congress rockets.—Pat.

"TUNE IS MONEY," so Franklin said. It is very true, and some people take plenty of it to pay their debts.—Pat.

LOUIS PASTEUR.—Another liberal encouragement of English art has just been given by the King of the French. The artist, Mr. Thomas Stothard, has been honoured by the present of an elegant watch and chain, valued at 100*l.* for his French watchmaking, in compliment to his recent views of "London as it is." A first work had been rewarded by the forwarding of a brilliant ring, composed of the pearls of Louis Philippe, surmounted by a diamond crown; but which, then, from the similarity of names between the artist and publisher, was addressed to the latter.—Ibid.

DISCUSSIONS IN PARLIAMENT ON THE AFFGHAN CAMPAIGN OF LAST YEAR.—The last mail has brought intelligence of the thanks voted by both Houses of Parliament to the Officers and troops who retrieved the honour of our arms in Affghanistan, and brought the war in China to a triumphant issue. Never were thanks more richly earned, or more cordially bestowed. They referred to a series of exertions which have raised our national credit to a pitch it had never yet reached in Asia, and extended our influence through the large countries of Eastern Asia, where it had never been felt before. The warm and grateful language which men of opposite sentiments vied with each other in adopting on this occasion, will not fail to impart an emotion of peculiar delight to those who were engaged in these arduous campaigns.

Thanks have also been voted—unanimously with one exception—to Lord Ellenborough, for the share which he bore in these transactions; for “the ability and judgement with which the resources of the British empire in India were applied in the support of the Military operations in Affghanistan.” This vote of thanks was preceded by the publication of a Blue book, containing a portion of the public documents which refer to the last campaign; and it supplies us with evidence of certain important facts, our knowledge of which previously rested on imperfect authority. To these we shall presently revert. It has now been solemnly declared by the verdict of the two estates of Parliament, that Lord Ellenborough did apply the resources of the British empire in India, in support of those operations, and that they were applied with much judgement and ability, as to merit the highest praise which an Englishman can receive. The natural inference from this vote is, that these judicious and able exertions contributed to the success of that campaign. At the risk of incurring the censure of the Standard as a member of that “ill conditioned press whose columns no man can escape,” we venture to question the truth of this assertion, and to affirm that the future historian, writing under the influence of truth, will find this vote of no other use than to shew the extent to which party spirit may successfully misrepresent facts even in the highest quarter. It is as well known in India, as that the sun set yesterday evening, that the troops, the provisions, and the cattle, with which General Nott advanced on Ghuzni and Cabul were supplied by the energy of Lord Auckland’s Government, and not by that of his successor. The entire force under General Pollock which achieved these successes had also been dispatched into Affghanistan by Lord Auckland; and not one additional soldier was sent by Lord Ellenborough. It is true that he did expedite the despatch of cattle, but those which were first sent were intended to bring back the troops, and not to support military operations in Affghanistan; those which were last sent did us no service in time. Sir Robert Peel has quoted, from Lord Ellenborough, which states that every possible effort had been made to supply General Pollock’s force with cartridges and to provide for the expected wants of General Nott’s force when it joined the Army in the Cabul valley; and that not fewer than sixteen thousand head of cattle had been provided. But we are also informed that this provision was made during the ten weeks preceding the 8th of September, that is after the 4th of July, when Lord Ellenborough suddenly changed his mind, and gave General Nott permission to retire by way of Cabul on his own responsibility. If these supplies had been pushed on after the letter of the 15th of March was sent to the Commander-in-Chief, they would have arrived in time to assist the progress of General Pollock. But they were not despatched till after Lord Ellenborough had allowed three months of golden time to slip through his fingers, during which he did nothing but reiterate his orders to retire. The consequence was that General Pollock was obliged to march without any of the sixteen thousand head of cattle,—excepting that portion which had been hired at Peshawar, and that when he did advance, he was so crippled in his means of transport as to be able to advance only a single brigade at a time. If his Lordship deserves the thanks of Parliament for such an application of the resources of India to the recovery of our honour in Affghanistan, how shall we estimate the debt of gratitude due to Lord Auckland who sent forward all the troops and four-fifths of the means of transport, by which that triumph was achieved.

Sir Robert Peel in the course of his speech is said to have drawn “a spirited parallel between the weak and miserable plight in which Lord Ellenborough at his landing in India found the resources of the country, and the triumphant state in which, by his energy and courage, those resources now existed.” That the country must be in a more flourishing condition after the successful close of a war which drained its resources, than it was while that war existed, is of course self evident; but the question is in what respect that improvement can be traced to the individual energy and courage of Lord Ellenborough? This is a historical and not a party question, and may be discussed without personal reflections. When Lord Ellenborough landed in February last, he found that our armies had experienced a calamitous reverse in Affghanistan; that the Governor General had stained every nerve to push forward men, cattle and ammunition to the relief of the troops; that he had been for two months applying the resources of the British empire in India with ability, judgement, and unsurpassed vigor to the support of Military operations in Affghanistan. He found the Cabinet in Calcutta, including Lord Auckland, Mr. Bird, Sir W. Canning and Mr. Pringle of opinion that the reasons which impelled our advance into Affghanistan no longer existed, and that all our efforts must now be directed to an honorable retirement from the country. If Lord Auckland had not been apprized that his successor was then on his way out, the troops he had collected would have been ordered to advance immediately; Cabul would have been recaptured in July instead of in September; by that month our troops would have recaptured the Sulejeh, and we should have abandoned Affghanistan; the vast expense of collecting an Army of Reserve would have been saved, and the first year’s out. loss would have closed three months sooner. Where is the display of that energy and courage on the part of his successor to which the triumphant state of our resources is to be attributed? Is it to be found in that caprice, or indecision which retarded this triumph for three whole months? Or is it to be sought for in the result of those labours which were imposed on the Finance Committees? All that they have been able to save by curtailing salaries, has been absorbed five times, ten times over by the costly pagantry of the army of Observation so long and so needlessly kept up at Peshawar.

Of the Blue Book of Documents we have no copy, and our only acquaintance with its contents is derived from the notices in the English Journals. They fairly bear out the statements, published in this country on imperfect authority, of Lord Ellenborough’s vacillation in reference to this war. It appears that his Lordship’s first despatch to the Commander-in-Chief when he wrote in conjunction with the Council, on the 15th of March, was a document remarkable alike for the wisdom of its views and the truly English character of its sentiments. It fully described the high encomium passed on it by the Duke. It ran thus: “whatever course we may hereafter take must rest solely upon military considerations, and here, in the first instance, regard to the safety of the detached bodies of our troops at Jellalabad, at Ghuzni, at Khelat-i-Ghilzie and Candahar—to the security of our troops now in the field from all unnecessary risk,—and finally, to the re-establishment of our military reputation by the restoration of some signal and decisive blow upon the Affghans, which may make it appear to them, to our own subjects, and to our allies, that we have the power of inflicting punishment upon those who commit atrocities and violate their faith, and that we withdraw immediately from Affghanistan, not from any deficiency of means to maintain our position, but because we are satisfied that the king we have set up, has not, as we were erroneously led to imagine, the support of the nation over which he has been placed.”

After having pledged himself to these views, Lord Ellenborough left his Council, and proceeded up the country, and immediately after ordered the troops to abandon Affghanistan and retire within the Indus and the Sutledge. The first order to this effect appears to have been issued about the middle of April. Sir Robert Peel says, that this order to abandon the country,—before we had done any thing to re-establish our military reputation, or recover our prisoners—arose from the shock which Belgardiers England and Wild had received; and he defends it on this ground; unquestionably the very worst he could have chosen. Nothing could be more fatal to the character of a Governor General than to assert, that he was ready to give up a line of policy, on which the most important political results depended, upon the first transient reverse which our arms experienced. But we do not believe Lord Ellenborough to be so chicken hearted. We believe that the order he issued immediately on being communicated from the Council, had no reference to the shock which the two Brigades experienced, and that they arose from a spontaneous determination to retire from the country, at all hazards. If the order to retire had been dictated by fear, counter order to advance would have been given when these fears were removed by the successful advance of Brigadier England to Candahar, and General Pollock to Jalalabad. Yet we find that after the first order to retreat had been issued, fresh orders to that effect were sent on the 29th April, with the full concurrence of the Commander-in-Chief! As though the salvation of British honour depended on the speed with which we could evacuate the country, these orders were reiterated to General Pollock on the 4th of May, and he was told that his favourable junction with Sir Robert Sale rendered it more easy for him to withdraw his troops. On the 18th of May, similar instructions were sent to General Nott, who was told that the improvement in his position did not appear to his Lordship to call for any variation in the orders to retreat by way of Sukkur which had been previously issued. Both Nott and Pollock remonstrated. The latter of the former is published; that of the latter has been omitted, accidentally we suppose. The Generals represented that the season was too far advanced for the retreat; and they were permitted to remain till October. These were the dispatches which raised such indignation in the two camps when their contents were generally known. On the 4th of July the Governor General again wrote to the Generals to say that no change had taken place in his views of the expediency of withdrawing the armies, at the earliest period. On that very same day, we are told, his Lordship determined to alter his policy, and instead of retreating while our national honour was still unvindicated, and the British prisoners were yet in captivity, resolved to advance to Cabul. It is no longer a matter of doubt that these conflicting opinions were entertained by the Governor General on this momentous subject in less than four months; and that on the last change of opinion, when he had resolved to advance, he did not order it to his own responsibility, but gave permission to General Nott to retire, by advancing on the capital. These facts are fully established on the authority of Parliamentary records. Every expression of thanks to Lord Ellenborough for having applied the resources of the British empire to the war in Afghanistan becomes the bitterest satire on the vacillation, which was displayed between the 15th of March and the 4th July. It is not for us to anticipate the labours of the historian; our contemporary position forbids it; but it requires no conjuncture to discern that the events of the past campaign, still appear in the page of history in a light discreditable to the reverse of that in which they are represented by the votes of the Imperial Parliament.

THE LONDON MAIL of the 4th of March contains but little intelligence, with the exception of the debates in Parliament in reference to the campaigns in China and Afghanistan. The subject had been three times brought under the consideration of the House of Commons within a month. Sir Robert's motion for an enquiry into the justice and expediency of the Afghan war has been lost by a large majority. Both Whigs and Tories voted against it. It appears as though there had been an understanding between the Ministers and their constituents to the effect that if the question was offered to the vote of thanks to Sir Robert Peel intended to propose to the House of Commons, the Ministry would withhold their support from Sir Robert's motion. Sir Robert's arguments against that motion appear to be sound. He considered it improper for the existing Government to lend its majority to a vote of censure on the conduct of a preceding Ministry; and impolitic to rip open a by-gone dispute at a time when we were cultivating a closer connection with Russia. Thus ends the threatened Parliamentary enquiry into the origin and management of the Afghan war. The subject cannot be again introduced to the notice of Parliament; it is laid on the shelf for good.

The vote of thanks to the army of Afghanistan was introduced in a speech by Sir Robert Peel, which will be read by every soldier engaged in that memorable campaign with the liveliest satisfaction. The commemoration of individual gallantry by the Premier in the great Council of the nation, cannot fail to operate as a powerful stimulus to honourable exertion. His speech is said to have exhibited consummate skill. He avoided every topic which could have roused opposition; and by filling the minds of the members with delight at the triumphant result of the campaign, prepared them to accord their thanks, unanimously, to the Noblemen by whom its arrangements were said to have been made. Few military enterprises have ever owed less to the presiding authority in India; and Sir Robert's praise is therefore great in proportion to the difficulty of the subject.

The Proclamation relative to the Somnath Gates was to be separately brought under the notice of Parliament in March. The Ministry have privately written to Lord Ellenborough to express their disapprobation of it, and in the two Houses have endeavored to palliate it, as far as it admitted of palliation. It is therefore certain that the Gates will not be taken out of the armoury at Agra to be sent to their original destination. As in the case of Mr. Erskine, his Lordship has wisely anticipated the views of the public authorities at home.

The distress of the labouring classes is scarcely alluded to in the papers which have been received by this opportunity; and we may therefore conclude that it has been somewhat mitigated. At Paisley, where the sufferings of the poor were most severe, the means of employment and subsistence appear to have been afforded to the manufacturers to such an extent as to remove all necessity for charitable aid.—The trial of Feargus O'Connor and the other Chartists on the charge of having endeavored to procure a change in the constitution by force had just commenced when the mail left. There is every appearance of their being acquitted, as a large number of the witnesses brought forward by the Crown deposed to their having used every endeavour to prevent violence.—The trial of Macnaghten, the assassin, had been postponed, and there is great probability of his being consigned to the mad house, instead of being sent to the gallows.—Government has resolved to repay from the funds obtained of the Emperor of China, the value of the opium which was delivered up to Capt. Elliott; but we have not been able to discover whether the exact amount to be thus refunded has transpired or not. It will probably fall below the expectations of the holders of the Scrip.

PETITION TO THE COURT OF PROPRIETORS BY THE NATIVES.—A meeting was held at the Town Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, to prepare an address of thanks to Mr. Sullivan for his endeavours to procure offices of larger emolument and trust for the Natives of India, and to petition the Court of Proprietors for higher appointments. The Harkers says, the meeting was "most numerously and respectfully attended by about five hundred persons including several Europeans and East Indians." Of the two addresses, the most important is that to the Proprietors and we give it below. In the general object of this petition we fully concur. From the time when this journal was established we have strenuously advocated the necessity of rendering our administration national by incorporating the hopes and interests of the native community with it. We have endeavored to show from the example of the Roman empire, how the conquerors and conquered might be amalgamated by a community of privileges. We have urged that it was impossible to carry on the government of India with any success upon the principle of excluding the children of the soil from all share in the higher departments of the administration; that it was our duty to educate the Natives so as to fit them for prominent offices under Government, and liberally to bestow those offices on them. We have endeavored to meet the objections which have been raised against the employment of Natives agency from individual failures, and to shew from a reference to our own history that official honesty has been a plant of slow growth in Europe; and that though it might be a plant of slower growth in Asia, where from time immemorial, high office has been invariably left to pay itself out of the pockets of the public, by turning power into money, this formed no reason for depriving a whole people of those motives to improvement which the prospects of a lawful ambition would supply. If therefore we offer some objections to the petition now sent home, it is not because we are adverse to its general object. The sentiments we have invariably expressed, relative to the judicious promotion of Natives to office, not only remain unchanged, but have gathered strength from observation.

The first paragraph of the petition is obscure. It states, that before we conquered the country, the administration of its civil affairs was wholly in the hands of the natives. What natives? If it be meant to include in this term all the Mahomedan Chiefs and Nobles, and Amils, who directed the administration, it involves a truism which does not at all advance the object of the petition. It will be no argument with the Proprietors at home for employing natives in high office that the country was governed for seven centuries by Natives under the foreign dynasty. If the petitioners mean to include Hindoos also in the term Natives, the assertion is incorrect. The Hindoos were entirely excluded from the administration of civil justice. No Hindoo appears to have sat on the bench in Bengal for five centuries and a half.

The second paragraph is also incorrect. "On the acquisition of the country by the British, the natives were removed from all places and employment of honour and emolument." The fact is that the administration was left in the hands of Natives for after years after we had gained the country. It was they who were entrusted with the largest power, and rewarded with the highest pay. At the time when a member of Council was receiving about Three Hundred Rupees a month, Mahomed Reza Khan, who was a kind of Chief Justice in Bengal, had a salary of Nine lakhs of Rupees a year. As low down as 1772, the Native Fouladar of Hooghly received 6000 Rupees a month. For the first sixteen or seventeen years after we had conquered Bengal, the Natives were overpaid; the Europeans underpaid. After that period, we passed into the opposite extreme, and raised the salaries of Europeans to a princely standard, and reduced those of the Natives to such a scale, that the highest native officer on the establishment received about as much as a Civilian usually spent on his household.

The 7th paragraph equally wants the support of truth. It states that since the new Charter was passed, which declared that no Native should be disabled from holding any place, or employment, by reason only of his religion, place of birth, descent or colour, there has been a considerable improvement in the treatment of the Natives. The petitioners, while seeking justice for themselves, ought not to be unjust to others. The improved treatment of Natives began before the Charter Act was passed, in the days of that enlightened statesman, Lord William Bentinck. It is to him and not to Parliament that they are indebted for that elevation of character and prospects which now emboldens them to look for a further elevation. We question whether the Section of the Act which the Petitioners refer to, was not the result of the advice which the Governor General himself gave, and of the experiment he carried through.

The petition appears to us to be equally wide of the mark when it states, that the bestowal of certain offices in the Civil administration exclusively on Europeans, that is on the Governated service, has defeated the intentions of Parliament. It is still wider from the truth in asserting that it was the intention of the last Charter to abolish entirely the distinctions of the Governated service. It was the intention of the Act to perpetuate that service with all its insanities through the currency of the Charter. It was its design to leave the patronage of that governated service with the Directors, at their remuneration for governing India; and it was not its design to destroy the value of that patronage by taking away the exclusive privileges of the Civil service in India. This is doubtless a very anomalous mode of paying men for their official labours; but it is a fact that the Directors have been thus paid for half a century, and that Parliament intended this mode of compensation to continue till the year of Grace, 1854. And it will not be altered till that year comes round. To destroy the privilege of the service would render it necessary to devise some new plan for paying the Directors, which would involve an organic change in the constitution of the Indian Government, and upon this extensive change Parliament will not enter before the period comes round in which the question of a new Charter will be forced on its consideration. It will then be open to Government to abolish the exclusive privileges of the Civil service, and to throw open the highest offices to native ambition, if the experiment originated by Lord William Bentinck is found to have been sufficiently successful. Meanwhile it will be the duty, as we know it will be the delight of the local government, gradually to open new and more important offices of trust and emolument to the Natives of the country. And of this we need no better proof than the fact that before the question of this meeting was mooted, Government had drafted a plan for employing native agency in the department of Police and Criminal Justice.

The address of Baboo Ram Gopal Ghose at the meeting was, on the whole, characterized by good sense and good feeling. It is true that he talked a little nonsense about the Mahomedan Government, and affirmed that it was superior to the English administration; which is as true as that the present Parliament is no wiser than the Saxons of Wittenamote—but he has since, we see, been anxious to efface the remembrance of the mistake. When he flies in the face of known, and acknowledged facts, he can injure no one but himself. He says truly, that the great deficiencies of the natives are their "want of integrity or want of knowledge of a superior order;" and while those deficiencies continue, it would scarcely be wise to entrust them with those higher offices which are coveted by many whose qualifications are in an inverse ratio to their desires. It is this want of integrity which has led the natives in the interior of the country to regard with any thing but satisfaction the elevation of their own countrymen to high office. Though Government may not have gone as far as the Native aspirants for office desire, it has gone further in the employment of Native agency than the great bulk of the people approve of, and their opinions must not be despised. These defects will be removed in time, and Government may do much towards their removal by the bestowal of adequate salaries; by a gradual enlargement of the scale of qualifications for office, and by the promotion of those who have acquitted themselves honourably in subordinate posts.

The remarks of the Baboo on the system of patronage in Leadenhall Street, requires some modification. The patronage must be lodged somewhere; if it be given to the Ministry, it will be used for Parliamentary purposes, and India will be none the better for the change. If it were given to the Baboos of Calcutta, we fear they would likewise forget their patriotism and bestow the writings on their own kindred and relatives. Indeed so very weak a human virtue that it is difficult to discover how this patronage may be disposed of so that it shall not be abused. The system to which the Baboo objects has, it must be confessed, imposed some irredeemable dolts on the country, but it has produced a body of men who, taken as a whole, may stand a fair comparison with any other body of official functionaries in the world for integrity, intelligence and honourable feeling. The system will doubtless be modified at the next renewal of the Charter, and the patronage distributed in other channels. What share of these good things which shall then fall to the lot of the natives of India, must depend on their official exertions. If they are enabled by a display of "higher integrity and knowledge of a superior order" to shew themselves worthy of being entrusted with those higher responsibilities which are now monopolized by the governated service, their claims will doubtless receive every consideration, when the time comes round.

THE BOMBAY TIMES ON THE VOYAGE OF THE HINDOSTAN.—Our Western contemporary is evidently somewhat disconcerted at the victory achieved by the Hindostan steamer in bringing a portion of the London Mail to Calcutta, earlier than the rest was received through Bombay. He repudiates the idea of having ever "carved two straws for the dignity of Bombay as the Steam port of India." Yet a reference to the Journals of that Presidency during the last four years would abundantly shew that that object has been to establish the necessity of making Bombay the head quarters of the Red Sea steamers, and that the idea of our receiving communications direct from Suva, has been any thing but acceptable to their minds. Our anxiety to enjoy the advantages which had been monopolized by Bombay, our "natural desire to have our mails as speedily and economically as possible" has been treated as a "morbid feeling." Our impatience for an equality of privileges has been characterized as evincing a hostile feeling towards Bombay; and our remonstrances against the inconvenience which we suffered from the exclusive benefits given to Bombay have been described as "breathing an arrogant tone." Yet it is not the less a fact that we have pleaded for nothing which was not just; and have raised no objection but to real grievances. We feel it to be a grievance that while one port received all its letters and packets from England at once, and without charge, our letters and papers should be doled out to us in dribbles, in seven or eight successive days, and at an enormous charge for inland postage. While our Bombay contemporaries have invariably asserted that the public funds should be expended solely in bringing all letters to its shop, to be distributed from thence to the rest of India, the Journals of Calcutta have advocated the plan of despatching the letters for Bombay and the places which can most conveniently be supplied from thence, directly to that port, and furnishing Ceylon, Madras and Calcutta, and the stations more immediately connected with them, with letters and papers by a direct communication. The efforts of the Bombay Press have, it is true, been exerted to secure the improvement of the road between it and the other Presidencies, but if this could have been accomplished at the same cost which would have been necessary for the establishment of steamers, it would still have left on us a grievous charge for postage.

The desire of the Bombay folks has been for such arrangements as would leave us dependent on that port for ever for our home communications. This state of dependence is unpleasant, not from any feeling of humiliation, but because it cannot be perpetuated without subjecting us to a loss both of time and money. We rejoice at the success of the Hindostan, for no earthly reason than because the metropolis of British India, and Madras and Ceylon, will thereby be enabled to receive all their letters and communications at once, and comparatively without cost. It was quite as natural for the Press of Bombay to be satisfied with existing arrangements, and to "hold on the even tenor of their way," as for us at this Presidency to object to them. They gave the most solid advantages to that Presidency, and inflicted the most serious inconveniences on us. It is natural for those who suffer to complain, and for those who enjoy a monopoly of privileges to be complacent. The difference of feeling at the two Presidencies stands thus; the degree of public opinion at Bombay advocated the exclusive preference of that port as the head quarters of the Steamers, with the full knowledge that under the most improved system, and after government had laid out sixty or eighty lakhs of Rupees, in forming a high road across the country, eleven hundred miles in length, Calcutta and Bombay could not be placed upon an equality of privileges, as it regards cost. We have advocated the establishment of a direct communication between Calcutta and Bombay, not understanding that it would not be so.

the facilities with the advantages now enjoyed by Bombay.

But the Times tells us he has frequently expressed the most cordial wishes that Calcutta might communicate with Basse direct, once a quarter, once a month, once a week, if it pleased them—provided the revenue or community at large did not thereby suffer. Most admirable distinctions! We have not the least objection to your having a direct communication, provided you pay for it out of your pockets; but we have the most serious objection to your enjoying this advantage from the public funds. Those funds ought to be sacredly employed in the support of Steamers to Bombay—and in giving us our letters free of cost. For our parts, we consider the empire as one and indivisible; its treasury a common treasury from which every Division is to be aided according to its exigencies, and not according to its individual contributions. The local fiscal divisions ceased when the Supreme Government was established over the whole territory. But if our Bombay contemporary will create invalid distinctions, and maintain that the public revenues ought to be devoted to the maintenance of Steam communication, at one port and not at another, we must recur to the old divisions of the empire into separate Presidencies, with their separate receipts and disbursements, and tell our Bombay friends that the expense of the Suez Canal which brings them papers and letters for nothing, is not drawn from the revenues of that Presidency—which till lately were unequal to its expenditures—but from the superabundant resources of this Presidency. If the Bombay community consider it necessary that restrictions should be imposed on the expenditures of the public funds, we must remind them that charity begins at home; and that Calcutta has the true claim to the establishment of a steam communication direct to Basse, when that communication is to be supported from its exchequer. We have not only an equal, but a prior right to the enjoyment of a direct intercourse with England, because all the sustenance which the Supreme Government gives to that intercourse is drawn from our funds.—But we repudiate any idea of exclusive benefit to ourselves. A large portion of the community can be supplied with early and cheap letters from Europe through the channel of Bombay; let the funds of the Gangetic vale be liberally appropriated to the maintenance of steam at that port. The interests of another portion of the Indian community, in which are included the inhabitants of Madras and of the Madras, and of the circumjacent districts, will be best promoted by the establishment of a direct communication to these Presidencies. Let the public funds of Fort William be given as far as they are needed to the support of this direct communication, also and likewise.

SIR W. MACAGUIER'S FUNERAL.—On Saturday last the mortal remains of Sir William Macaguiers were interred in the new burial ground in Calcutta. The funeral was attended by a large body of civil and military officers, and by many of the private friends of the deceased, both European and Native. The scene had an impressive character, more especially to those who had personally witnessed the honorable career of Sir William, from the first development of his talents in the College of Fort William, to the period when he had attained the highest honours of the British Empire, and stood appointed Governor of the East of India Company within his grave, and he seemed to have reached the zenith of human prosperity, he was cut down by a base assassin, amidst scenes of national humiliation, to which our History had hitherto been a stranger. The solemn interest of the scene was increased by the presence of the deceased Envoy's Military Secretary, Major Lawrence, who was with him on the fatal 23d of December, and now stood at the foot of the grave, absorbed in those painful recollections which crowded upon his mind.

It was hoped that a public funeral would have been accorded to the remains of one so eminent in station, and who fell in the discharge of his public duty. It was resolved otherwise. The arguments which have been advanced against it are, we must confess, any thing but satisfactory. But though these public honours have been denied him, his own relatives will find the omission more than compensated by the respect spontaneously offered to his memory by the large body of friends who assembled on Saturday around his grave.

MORTALITY IN THE JAILS.—The Herkers hinted last week that the crowded state of our jails at this Presidency, and the increase of mortality had attracted the attention of the Court of Directors, and that some decisive change in the administration of criminal justice might shortly be expected. The subject is one of great importance, involving as it does not only the interests of the fifty thousand prisoners now in confinement, but the security of the community at large. The punishment awarded to criminals is intended partly as a retributive measure, partly as a check on the commission of crime, and the increase or diminution of crime must in some measure depend on the degree to which punishment serves to deter from the commission of it.

The increase of prisoners in our jails has arisen not so much from the increase of crime, as from the abolition of corporal punishment, and the substitution of protracted imprisonment in its stead; and one of the measures for reducing the number of prisoners which our contemporary states as being under consideration, is a return to the use of the Karak. To differ from so high an authority as Lord William Bentinck, on such a subject, might save of presumption; but as he considered it impolitic to abolish corporal punishment in every instance, the propriety of its abolition must have appeared to him to rest on circumstances. The circumstances of the country recommend the use of the Karak. As a punishment it is perfectly in accordance with the habits and feelings of society in this country. The servile culprits who compose the vast majority of our prisoners, so far as punishment deters from crime, would be more deterred from its commission by the fear of the rotun than by the fear of imprisonment; and the interests of society would, we think, be benefited if the use of the cane was again resorted to. The mortality which prevails in jails when these crowded by the unwholesome substitution of confinement for the whipping post, furnishes an additional argument for corporal punishment. It is more humane to subject a man to a dozen or two of strokes and dismiss him, than to keep him for two or three years in a crowded jail, where his life is endangered. If it be said, that the man who has been chastised with stripes remains for life a stunted man, and that his return to a virtuous course is highly problematical; the same may be said in a great measure of the man who has been set to work in a house, the staple of which are generally indolence.

We believe the general experience of every society is against the efficacy of confinement, and in favour of that of corporal punishment, and that its voice is all but unanimous for its being restored.

The Court, it is said, propose also to diminish the mortality in jails, by thinning the population by means of emigration. They are desirous of transporting those who are sentenced to imprisonment for seven years and more. Transportation would certainly be more conducive to the health of the culprit than a residence in our suffocating jails; it would be advantageous also to the settlements to which the convict may be sent, where labour is scarce and dear; but it would be far more expensive to the state. It is chiefly on this ground that the objection to it rests. At the same time it must not be forgotten that the present number of convicts is barely sufficient to keep the public roads in repair, and unless Government is prepared to sanction a distinct outlay for this specific purpose, the abstraction of five or six thousand labourers will be severely felt. It is true, that no labour is so expensive as convict labour. Our roads might be repaired at a far less cost, on contract, than by the compulsory labour of prisoners. The wisest plan that could be adopted would be to compel the prisoners to earn their bread by some trade within the walls of the prison, and make their punishment consist in regular labour and close discipline; and to invite tenders for the repairs of the roads; but Government has no means and appliances for the establishment of trades in prisons, and no disposition to "use its ways" by devoting public funds to the work. Our roads are now kept in repair because Government is constrained to feed the convicts, and is anxious to obtain some return. When these convicts have been dispersed to other settlements, the roads will run rapidly to decay.

But one cause of the mortality in jails among the working class of convicts is to be found, if we are not much mistaken, in the inequality of the food allowed them. One meal of cooked food, a day is barely sufficient to keep soul and body together in a convict who is sentenced to labour. An intermediate mouthful of pulque is a poor succedaneum. This assertion is supported by apparently strong evidence. In one return now before us, in a jail in which a single meal a day is allowed, the mortality among the labouring prisoners, in fifteen months, was one in eight; among the non-labouring prisoners, one in thirty-two; among the debtors only one in sixty-nine. How far this result of the single meal system may be borne out by the experience of other jails, we cannot say; perhaps this article may induce some of our friends in the interior to furnish us with jail statistics, but it is manifest from the vast difference of mortality between those who labour and those who do not, that the same quantum of food which suffices for the one will not answer for the other. From the evidence now before us, we are driven to the conclusion that if the convicts who are subjected to labour, had two meals a day, the mortality would be greatly diminished.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 30.

—The Hughly Steamer has arrived from Madras. Part of that town had been burnt. The Commissioner had, as one of his last acts, visited the western frontier, with a view to effect a settlement of the southern boundary. There was a report that an ambassador from China had ar-shred at Ranoo, with an escort of a thousand men, and that Theroowdy had ordered him to reduce the number to forty. Is the brother of the man and the cousin brother, but also from these he allows to regard as his own tributaries?

It is an amusing coincidence, that just at the time when public attention has been drawn to the Ningo Ball, we should receive an account which we have given elsewhere—of the casting of a magnificent Ball at Bangalore, weighing 900 tons! Should our troops ever visit Bangalore, they visited Ningo, this Ball will fall into their possession; but they fear the Prime Committee will not refuse, as they did the Ningo ball, a Ball which contains 617 lbs. avoirdupois of silver, and 110 lbs. of gold.

Mr. H. V. Bayley, the Secretary to the Council of Education, has been sent, as the papers say, to Midnapore to officiate as a Special Deputy Collector. Dr. Monat has been appointed to succeed him as Secretary to the Council of Education, and Mr. T. B. Davidson is to do the duty of Secretary in the Education department. As both these gentlemen have quite as many other duties as they can well get through, the business of public instruction will as matter of course fall into abeyance, since nothing beyond the fragments of official leisure are to be bestowed on it.

The papers from Bombay announce the arrival of the Suez Steamers from Karachi, which she left on the 7th of April. So entirely had our enemies believed the dawkin, that Sir Charles Napier's victory at Hyderabad is not been heard of there, twelve days after the event.

Letters from Sindh state, that Lord Ellenborough, finding Agra too hot, has abandoned the experiment he was trying on his constitution, and has resolved upon retreating to the Hills.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

A Dell's Gazette extra has just come in, announcing that the old Rames of Kythul, one of the Sikh protected states, has declared war against Lord Ellenborough, and defeated a detachment of British troops to the number of two hundred. Kythul is the largest of the Protected states, and contains 500 villages, which yield a revenue of more than 200 lakhs of Rupees, fifty thousand pounds sterling, by the year. The old incumbent was a paralytic, recently died without issue, and according to treaty, this small little estate descended to the ruling power. The old Rames however was determined not to give up his possessions. He is said to have sent his porter running to the heads of the villages to call on them to rally round his standard. They mustered six thousand men and foot, and fell on the two companies stationed there, who made a brave resistance, and retreated to Kernal, but not till after Capt. Whistler had been killed, Lieut. Farr wounded, and one fifth of the brave little band killed or disabled, and their camp burned. A large body of troops has been sent out to fight the old Rames, and there can be no doubt of their success.

Mr. F. O'Hanlon has been dismissed from the Magistracy by the Deputy Governor.

The Bombay papers state, that some official persons have been to examine Dutch's Island, which is represented by the seat of malaria. It was reported to be the intention of Government to make it the prison of the Amers of Feinde.

Lord Ellenborough's proclamation on the receipt of Sir Charles Napier's second victory has just reached us; and we have placed it among the extracts. It exhibits quite a great improvement upon previous communications which have been issued from the same mind. If we had not been assured that his Lordship does not read the local papers—Mr. Hutcheson's Gazette excepted—we should be inclined to flatter ourselves that the structure of the paper had been without their use.

Sir Charles Napier's dispatch will also be found in another column. It is of the same coarse character as his letters. The style is clumsy and dilapidated. We observe by a glance of the eye that it is the production of a brave soldier. It contains a great victory in the simplest language. The General does ample justice to his brave companions in arms without allowing us to suppose that he thought for a moment of his own glory. There is one remarkable feature in this dispatch, which deserves not only to be commended but to be reproduced in every other despatch. It mentions by name the soldiers and non-commissioned officers who distinguished themselves in the engagement in their personal conflict with the enemy and in capturing their standards. How cheaply might a new impulse be given to the soldiers, and elevated motives to exertion be infused into their minds, if this noble example of General Napier's was generally followed.

Dost Mahomed is at one end of the Khyber and Akbar Khan at the other. He has come down to Jullahabad to meet his father. The Court of Lahore begins to tremble for the security of its possessions beyond the river. Five Regiments had previously been sent to reinforce Attock. On hearing of Akbar Khan's movement, two others were sent with five guns.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22.

Sir George Pollock has arrived at Dinapore, of which Division he assumes the command.

The Mail which arrived last year on the 17th, has not yet made its appearance. The last Bombay papers are totally at a loss to account for the delay.

The Bombay Gentlemen's Gazette states, that intelligence had been received to the effect, that the troops which had been sent from Hyderabad had captured Omroote, which is on the verge of the Desert. But the intelligence wants confirmation. If Omroote has fallen, Maerpoor, which lies half way between Hyderabad and that place, must have been previously captured, and the capture of so important a place would undoubtedly have been announced.

The Bombay papers state, that Major Clibborn had demanded a Court Martial, in retributions to the officer at Mowee, in which his corps was not suffered to fight. It was said, to be a misunderstanding of the orders sent to it.

Further particulars of the affair at Kythul appear in the papers of this morning. It is said that the two companies acknowledge to the loss of only thirty men, while the enemy lost five hundred; but as the enemy remained masters of the field, it is impossible that the retreating troops should have been able to form any estimate of the loss. They retreated in good order to Kernal, which was drawn into a state of unusual commotion by the event. It was determined at length to send off a force sufficiently large to meet any emergency. One of the letters published in the Dell's Gazette states, that there is not a history gun between that city and Ferozepore.

The grounds upon which Mr. O'Hanlon has been relieved from the magistracy are, that "the transaction betrays on his part such serious defects of judgment and discretion, and unfortunately so wide a departure from some of those principles which are of importance to a due administration of justice, that Government cannot consistently with its duty to the public, permit him, after the exposure which has taken place, to retain his position as one of the Magistrates of Calcutta." It is said, that Mr. O'Hanlon intends to appeal to Lord Ellenborough.

The Havicks states, that Government have purchased the Kildarepoor docks for five lakhs of Rupees, and that a dock is to be prepared capable of accommodating steamers of the largest size.

The Subscription for the Thousandth of Mr. Greenlaw has amounted to 10,000 Rs. of which 2000 Rs. have been collected. At a meeting of the subscribers held yesterday, it was resolved that the sum of 2000 Rs. be appropriated to a Marble bust, and the remainder to a service of plate with a marble inscription.

The Bengal British has in its weekly number on Thursday last. The resolution regarding the loyalty of the new association has been considerably modified; but in our humble opinion it is altogether out of place. The more the British tells of its loyalty, the more that loyalty is likely to be brought into suspicion. There are certain virtues, of the male as well as of the female character, the existence of which is always taken for granted, till it appears necessary to assert it.

MONDAY, APRIL 24.

The London Mail of the 4th of March came in on Saturday morning, in forty-eight days. At this favorable season of the year it reached Bombay in forty days. The same of the delay is traced to certain improvements in the machinery which retarded the progress of the steamer to the extent of three days.

A correspondent of the Englishman, advertising to the petition which the Landholders are about to present to Government begging that a retrospective effect may be given to the rule which releases all parcels of ground under fifty bighas from assessment, suggests that the Landholders themselves should be obliged to supply all the lands to that extent of which they have dispossessed their tenants. He affirms that the Resumption survey has done nothing in comparison with the Zamindari survey.

The Dell's Gazette publishes letters from Kernal which contradict the report of Capt. Whistler's death, in the attack made by the troops belonging to the old Gases of Kythul. Mr. Clark was busy superintending the arrangements for putting down this insurrection, and it is stated that General Fane was to take the command of the troops, who after all will probably find nothing to do. The more report of their advance will be sufficient to disperse the rabble army, unless there should be other clash engaged in the plot.

The intelligence from Agre is, that Lord Ellenborough intends to give a grand ball and supper on the approaching St. George's day in honor of Her Majesty's birth-day, and that he proposes to proceed to Hyderabad, in Sindh. The former was to take the command of the troops, who after all will probably find nothing to do. The more report of their advance will be sufficient to disperse the rabble army, unless there should be other clash engaged in the plot.

The Madras papers hold out a hope, that the transit duties at that Presidency are about to be abolished. It is time they should be. The 'curse' as Mr. Parker called these duties, has always been heavier at Madras than ever it has been; yet we were relieved of it seven years ago.

TUESDAY, APRIL 25.

The period for the departure of the next Mail from Calcutta is the 5th of May, which is ten days earlier than usual. A similar anticipation of the regular period has been announced for the three succeeding months, to afford the Bombay Steamers sufficient time to reach Suez in the tenth of the monsoon.

The Star remarks, that four of the officers recently removed from the Senger and Northbrook agency have been appointed Quarter Masters and interpreters of their corps, viz. Lieutenants William Dymally, James Dymally, and that these appointments must be satisfactory to their minds as showing that their dismissal from civil employ has made no unfavorable impression on the Commander-in-Chief.

The letter from the Landholders' Society to the Government of Bengal, regarding the operation of the new rule in the districts of the British and Havicks of this day. It is too long for our limited space, but we hope to be able to discuss the grievances of which it complains next week.

The Star states, that the new rule has been made during since the appointment of a separate Magistrate at Howrah opposite Calcutta; that if he proves to be the south of the district, they break forth in the form of a petition, and he is to know where to discover the reason as he assess the districts. That paper states, that on Saturday night they came upon an extensive robbery, and mutilated the owner of the house they entered. These facts only serve to show the necessity of establishing a separate Magistrate in this populous district.

There was a respectable number of persons yesterday evening at the house of Mr. Greenlaw to present him with a public address signed at a meeting of the inhabitants of Calcutta in the and which probably has arisen not only from the color and preservation of the comet, but also from the same description, that has been given of them, either by the observers themselves, or by those who drew up the accounts, and perhaps did not fully comprehend the interesting meaning of the subject. The difficulty also is very much increased from the want of drawings to represent the exact appearance seen; which, if carefully and judiciously described by this method, than by any verbal description. During the present century no other eclipses of this kind has taken place in the United States of America, which was observed by Mr. Fournier, and the same account, has been published in the sixth volume of the Transactions of the American Philosophical Society. These are the cases of interest that are on record since the invention of the telescope, within which period we must necessarily limit our attempt to acquire any useful information relative to this remarkable phenomenon. But, I must proceed with my narrative.

My original intention was to have taken up my station, for observing the eclipse, at Diges, in the south of France; and I had proceeded on my way thither till I arrived at Lyons, where I found that I had a few days to spare; and, as I had proposed to visit Venice before my return home, I altered my route, and resolved to proceed in a quiet manner, along the line of the great canal, and to witness the eclipse, when I proposed to halt at the most convenient place that might offer. I therefore turned off towards Charenton, and crossing the Alps at Mont Cenis, passed the great chain of the mountains, and arrived at Paris about noon on July 7th. As this place was directly on the central line of the comet's shadow, I resolved at once to make it my headquarters. I had intended to apply to the director of the university there, for the use of a convenient place where I might observe the eclipse; but I was generally anticipated in this respect, by a notice from one of the Professors, who having learned of my arrival and my object, immediately and obligingly came to offer me the use of any one of the apartments in the university that might be considered most adapted for my purpose. On accompanying him to the university, with this object, I selected one of the upper rooms of the building, which was admirably adapted for making the observations. The apartment was very liberally furnished with the necessary apparatus, and with every instrument at the university, that I might require for my use. But, I had taken with me from London the same 24-inch telescope, which I had formerly used in the smaller eclipse of May 15, 1822, as already described in the tenth volume of the Memoirs of the Society; and I therefore informed him that all I wanted was a table and stool during the whole time of the eclipse, being fully persuaded that nothing is so injurious to the making of accurate observations, as the interference of any extraneous object. Acting upon this hint, he immediately took the key from the outside of the door, and placed it in the inside, and told me that I might lock myself in; but there was no occasion for this precaution, for although I heard numerous foot-steps pass the door, in consequence to an adjoining apartment, which was also used as an observatory until noon, no one attempted to enter the room in which I was located. At four o'clock in the morning of the eventful day I went to the university, in order to prepare for the observation; and at that early hour I found many of the students and old scholars were walking about. All manner of trifles of all kinds were seen in the street near the horizon, but the sun soon got above this observation, and the remainder of the day was quiet and clear. At four o'clock was not a cloud was to be seen in any part of the heavens, visible from my window, during the whole time of the eclipse. It was on the day as that which I had formerly observed in the smaller eclipse of May 15, 1822, that I had a very good observation of the commencement, and the end of the eclipse; but I did not pay any great attention to these secondary objects; and, as my observations were not adjusted to current moon time, these observations can be of no use, except as indicating the duration of the eclipse, which, according to my reckoning, was 15. 58m. 30.6s mean time. As the moon passed over the horizon, and in conjunction with the sun, I watched very carefully, and with much anxiety, the approach of the horizon of the moon towards the still invisible horizon of the sun, which was now rapidly assuming a fine aureole, the precursor of total obscuration. I was a great deal concerned, in order to observe the phenomenon, notwithstanding the fact that I had been informed by the secretary by an American observer; and the power of the eye glass was about 60. When the total obscuration took place, the colored glass was removed, and at least looked at the black disk of the moon, which were seen in the smaller eclipse of 1822; they would probably produce the same appearance. Then, however, did not make their appearance; on, at least, they were not so distinct as they were in the smaller eclipse; and, in fact, they were distinctly visible; and, in fact, they were not so distinct as they were in the smaller eclipse.

chromometer, and was the act of counting the seconds in order to ascertain the time of their duration, when I was surrounded by a tremendous burst of applause from the streets below, and at the same moment was startled at the sight of one of the most brilliant comets I had ever seen. The comet was a magnificent sight. For, at that instant, the dark body of the moon was suddenly surrounded with a aureole, or kind of bright light, similar in shape and relative position to that which rendered the comet so remarkable, and which, by the French is designated an aureole.

Paris contains many thousand inhabitants, the major part of whom were at this early hour, walking about the streets and squares, or looking out of windows, in order to witness this long talked of phenomenon; and when the total obscuration took place, which was instantaneous, there was an universal shout from every observer, which "made the welkin ring;" and, for the moment, withdrew my attention from the object with which I was immediately occupied. I had indeed anticipated the appearance of a luminous aureole round the moon during the time of total obscuration; but I did not suppose that any of the thousands of preceding eclipses that I had read, to witness so magnificent an exhibition as that which took place. I had imagined (erroneously as it seems) that the aureole would be exhibited in luminous appearance, would not be greater than that faint conical light which sometimes takes place on a summer's evening, and that it would enclose the moon like a ring. I was therefore somewhat surprised and astonished at the splendid scene which now so suddenly burst upon my view. It riveted my attention so effectually that I quite lost sight of the string of beads, which however was not completely obscured, when this phenomenon first appeared. I apprehended that only a few seconds of time (perhaps 3 or 4) were wanting to complete the perfect obscuration of the sun; but I cannot speak on this point with much certainty. I had previously noted down some of the principal objects to which I was desirous of directing my attention during the time of total obscuration, and which seem to have given rise to much discussion on former occasions. These, as far as the aureole is concerned, had reference principally to its color, its lustre or repose, its magnitude and extent, its state of motion or position, and its coinciding with the sun or the moon; its centre; then, as to the moon, whether any light were discernible, or any communication of light on the dark side; and, as to the nature of darkness in the atmosphere, the change of color in surrounding clouds, and some other points not requisite here to enumerate further. The time however for making observations of this kind is always so short (in total eclipses (in the present case being less than 15 minutes) that one individual can scarcely attend to all the objects that are requisite to be noticed; more especially when the attention is called away (as in this instance) by any new phenomenon which had not been previously observed, or even anticipated. It is therefore desirable, in any future occurrence of this nature, that a division of labor should be made between 3 or 4 observers at the same place: each attending solely to the part which he has selected for his particular object.

The breadth of the aureole, measured from the circumference of the moon, appeared to me to be nearly equal to half the moon's diameter. It had the appearance of brilliant rays. The light was most dense (judged, I may say quite down) close to the border of the moon, and became gradually and uniformly more attenuated as its distance therefrom increased, assuming the form of diverging rays, in a reticulate manner, and of the consistency of smoke and of a several length; so that in an part of the aureole could I discover the regular and well defined shape of a ring at its outer margin. It appeared to me to have the appearance of the aureole, but I was not taking any accurate measures for determining this point. Its color was quite white, not pure white, nor yellow, nor red; and the rays had a vivid and gliding appearance, as if they were composed of some light illuminator might be supposed to assume, if forced into a similar shape. I should think it not impossible to give a satisfactory representation of this phenomenon by some artificial contrivance, such as a light illuminator like it, in miniature, by the reflection of the sun's light from a piece of broken glass; and on a larger scale, by the use of the sun's rays through a grove of trees; but in both these cases it is necessary to choose the central portion of the rays. The brilliancy of the aureole was however quite as great as that which is produced by other of the natural lights here alluded to. I have annexed herewith a drawing of the aureole, representing as nearly as I can preserve in my recollection, the appearance of the aureole and rays, and the position of the sun, as they appeared at the middle of the total obscuration. I had no time or opportunity for ascertaining the deviation of the moon from the actual position of the aureole, at any other point of its progress.

Spent and remaining however in this remarkable phenomenon, only was, and although it could not fail to call forth the admiration and applause of every beholder, yet I must confess that there was at the same time something in its singular and beautiful appearance that was appalling; and I can hardly imagine that unworldly notions may occasionally have been excited in the minds of some of the observers, more especially in times when the true cause of the phenomenon may have been but faintly understood, and the phenomenon itself wholly unexplained. But the most remarkable circumstance attending this phenomenon (at least, that which most engaged my observation during the short interval of total obscuration, and drew my attention from all other objects of interest) was the appearance of three large protuberances apparently emanating from the circumference of the moon, but evidently forming a portion of the aureole. They had the appearance of mountainous, of a prominent elevation; their colour was red, tinged with blue or purple; perhaps the colour of the peach blossom would more nearly represent it. They somewhat resembled the snowy tops of the Alpine mountains, when colored by the rising or setting sun. They resembled the Alpine mountains also in another respect, inasmuch as their light was perfectly steady, and had none of that flickering or quivering motion so visible in the light of the candles. All the three protuberances were of the same moderate cast of colour, and very distinct from the brilliant white light that formed the aureole; but they differed in position, in size, and in shape. Mr. Baily exhibited a drawing on which was represented the appearance of the shape, size, and position of these several protuberances. The whole of these three protuberances were of the same moderate cast of color, at least, I never lost sight of them, when looking in that direction; and, when the first ray of light was admitted from the sun, they vanished with the aureole altogether, and day-light was then thickly restored. My attention was so constantly taken by these remarkable and unexpected appearances, that I continued to watch for the re-appearance of the aureole, and therefore cannot add my testimony to the re-occurrence of this phenomenon.

The darkness, during the time of total obscuration, was not so great as I had anticipated. I had caused a lighted candle to be prepared, in order to be ready in case of need; but I eventually anticipated it; as I found it could read very small print, and use the time by my chronometer, without its aid. Prior to the commencement of the eclipse I had observed a great number of swallows flying about; but towards the middle of the eclipse they had all vanished, and did not appear again till about 10 minutes after the first ray of light emanated from the sun, when they were as active, and soon became as numerous, as ever. During the time of total obscuration, I watched the moon, and the position of the body of the moon, but could not discern any bright spot that might be mistaken for a hole; nor could I discover any communications issuing from the dark side of the moon. These, however, were the secondary observations. I was told that several stars were seen, but I could not spare the time to look after for them myself; every moment was occupied with more important matter. Having thus given a detail of all the principal circumstances that occurred, and precisely in the manner in which they presented themselves to my view, so far as my recollection (connected to memory, immediately after the event) will assist me, I had intended to have subjected to this communication an account of the several phenomena that had been seen on former occasions of this kind, and to have compared the various descriptions with each other, in order to see how far any difference that was observed might be reconciled with present appearance; but I was so much occupied with the present event, that I could not do so. I adopted in my memoir relative to the smaller eclipse in 1826. But, I fear that I may have been somewhat too much influenced by the force of the meeting; and I am moreover of opinion that a review of this kind can be taken with greater advantage at a more extended period of time, when the memory will be more free of the several observations that have been made on the present eclipse, at different places on the Continent, and which might thus be introduced into the present memoir, and a more complete description would be useful to future observers. I may probably retrieve again upon the time and situation of the Society's Affair.

SCINDA.—Since our last issue intelligence has been received of the capture of Meerpoor and its environs. Meerpoor was occupied by Sir Charles Napier without opposition. As the Scinde was rapidly rising at Hyderabad, he felt it his duty to fix his head quarters there, and to send a detachment against Omereote. It was said to be defended by a powerful garrison; and it was expected to require a long and arduous siege, which it appeared undesirable to undertake at so advanced a period of the season, while the India was rising with universal force. He resolved therefore to defer the investment of the place, and had issued orders for the retirement of the troops when his commander was informed that it had been evacuated. Between his anxiety to gratify the desires of the General in Chief by the occupation of this important post, and his desire not to disobey positive orders, he knew what course to adopt. In this dilemma, Lieut. Brown, of the Bengal Engineers, rode forty miles to Hind Quarters and forty miles back again, to find a Scindian man, in the month of April, to obtain the General's permission to take possession of the Fort. The permission was of course readily given. This extraordinary exertion of Lieut. Brown is mentioned in the despatch to the Governor General, in a manner well calculated to excite admiration—by a simple narrative of the fact. We have now therefore possession of every fortress in Scinde without hindrance. It is to all appearance completely subdued. The Amere have been removed to Bombay, and the administration of the country, the collection of the revenue, and the charge of the Police, has been formally assumed by British officers.

Sir Charles Napier is issuing his instructions to the Magistrates and Collectors of Hyderabad, Kanbeer and Sukker, directing that they shall not make any avoidable change in the ancient customs and laws of the country as we now find them; because "the conquest of the country is a sufficient tribulation for the people of that country." Slavery is among the most ancient customs and laws of Scinde, and the institution is not so intimately interwoven with the habits and feelings of society that few circumstances are likely to excite greater convulsion than the sudden and peremptory abolition of it. Lord Ellenborough peremptorily decreed freedom to every slave in Scinde within a week after hearing that the country was ours, and made all Acts of holder's Society for a modification of the New Parliament which relate to Slavery current in Sale Law; but the object it proposes is so that newly acquired province. It is impossible to reconcile the decree of the Governor General with the orders of the Governor of Scinde. They are diametrically opposed to each other, yet the Governor General has approved and confirmed the General's Orders. Are we to understand by this confirmation that Slavery is not abolished in Scinde, and that Lord Ellenborough has availed himself of the opening afforded by Sir Charles Napier's orders, to cast into abeyance, an order of his own, which, under the circumstances in which it was passed, will be pronounced by the most ardent abolitionists, not only injudicious but pernicious?

The Amere of Scinde have arrived at Bombay and have been treated by the Governor with all that generous consideration which it was in his power to bestow on them. We copy from the Times an account of their demeanour and appearance. It is calculated to create painful interest. Though the Amere have no claim to that greatness of character which is "sanctioned by fall from power," it is impossible to contemplate without pain, the situation of men who not three months since were independent princes ruling over a large country, and honoured even to adulation, and are now reduced to the humiliating condition of prisoners of war, shut out from every association which could impart pleasure, and left to raminate on their fall without any hope of relief. Though in their Government they were despotic, and commerce decayed, and the land withered under their sway, yet so sudden and calamitous a change in their circumstances involuntarily fills the mind with melancholy emotions.

"'Tis but the same rehearsal of the past," says Byron, and here is an exemplification of his assertion. Lord Ellenborough came out to restore peace to India, and we have had two bloody battles in a war of his own kindling. He impetuous Generals Nott and Pollock to retreat, retreat, retreat, while the prisoners, men, women, and children, were yet in the hands of the enemy, and the stain on our banner was not obliterated, and he has now been engaged in hastening reinforcements into a country with which we were at peace when he landed in India a twelvemonth ago. He censured Lord Auckland for engaging in a war which was a mistake and might be a crime, he has now given his opponents occasion to say that he has himself plunged into a war which is a crime, and may be a mistake. He who considered Dost Mahomed as having become our prisoner by unjustifiable means, now holds the Amere of Scinde as his own prisoners of war. The Governor General who declared he was content with the empire we were in possession of on the 1st of October, has added to it a large kingdom, fertile as Egypt, and larger than Persia. He who declared that the India was our boundary, has appointed British Officers to collect revenue and administer justice in a province beyond that

THE LANDHOLDERS' SOCIETY'S PETITION ON THE NEW SALE LAW.—We regret that we are unable to find room for the petition of the Landholders' Society for a modification of the New Parliament which relates to Slavery; but the object it proposes is so small a compass, and the objections it advances to the existing system lie within so small a compass, that the following recapitulation of them may be sufficient. In the original draft of the Act it was provided, that all estates, of which the revenue had not been paid up on certain fixed days, (about four in the year) should be absolutely put up to auction and sold. It also directed that a notification of the Estates to be thus sold should be affixed in the Collector's office, at every Civil Court, and every thanna in the district, as well as on the estate advertised, not more than one month, and not less than fifteen days before the day of sale. In the Act which was eventually passed, this provision was omitted, and it was ordained that the estate should be peremptorily sold the day after the forfeiture had been incurred by the non-payment of the periodical instalment.

The Landholders' Society now prays that the provision which was originally made for giving adequate notice of the sale, may be restored; and they support the petition by the following observations. First, that the sale of the estate without notice is injurious to the defaulter, who receives the surplus proceeds of the sale after the public dues have been paid; in as much as the estate cannot be expected to sell for more than the fact of the sale is not known to those who have the means of paying an adequate price for it. Secondly, that it is injurious to mortgagors, who have advanced money on the security of the estate; and is calculated generally to discourage the devotion of capital, by way of loan, to agricultural operations. When the estate is thus sold, in a measure, under the rose, it is not likely to fetch a full price, and the mortgagor has little prospect of obtaining any thing like complete repayment of his loan. The publicity originally proposed would have had the effect of attracting purchasers and enhancing the value of the estate by competition, or it would have enabled the mortgagor to protect his own interests by himself bidding for the estate. Thirdly, The capitalist who is desirous of investing his money in landed property, has no opportunity of doing so under the present system at the periodical sales. He resides generally in Calcutta, or in the large towns in the interior, and it is impossible during the short interval which elapses between the forfeiture and sale of an estate, that he should be able to make arrangements for the purchase of it. It is impracticable for more reasons than one; but it is enough to state that it is physically impossible. The consequence is stated to be, that the estates fall into the hands of land speculators, or the Native officers of the Civil Court and of the Collectorate. Fourthly, The want of due publicity compromises the interests of co-purchasers, who are now allowed to purchase an estate thus brought to the bazaar in which they have a share. If they happen to be on the spot, well and good. If they are not within eight or ten hours' sail of the Collector, they cannot present the estate by bidding for it. The last reason given by the Landholder's Society, that the situation of the holders of under-tenures is determined by the present system, appears to us to be feeble.

Their situation is equally unfortunate, wherever may purchase the estate. Their tenures are liable to be cancelled, and their rents to be enhanced whether the purchaser be a man of substance or a mere speculator; and experience proves that there is not much to choose between them, as it regards consideration for the ryots. The frequent sale of estates and the repeated change of masters is death to the happiness of the tenant; and it is therefore advantageous to them that the estate should pass into the hands of a man who has the desire and the power of retaining it, rather than of one who buys it in order to sell it again at an advantage; otherwise, it must be indifferent to whom the power of the acre is transferred.

The arguments brought against the system may therefore be resolved into two; the first, that estates when sold without due publication, do not realise an adequate sum, whereby the interests of the unfortunate defaulter, and of the mortgagees are sacrificed; and secondly, that the want of publicity prevents the distant capitalist from investing his money in land, or the absent co-purchaser from protecting his interest by purchasing the estate. The Society state that the value of estates has deteriorated under the operation of the new law. This statement, however, is altogether new, and quite opposed to the general impression of its results. We have always understood that since it came into operation, not only had the number of estates sold, but sales diminished, but that the prices bid for them exceeded the sums which had been realised for some years under the old system. The memorial declares that the value obtained in 1838-40 was 810 per cent. on the annual rent; that is, a little above three years' purchase; in 1840-41, 836 per cent., or about four years and a half's purchase; and in 1841-42, during the operation of the law, 864 per cent., or two years and a half's purchase. These statements may refer only to a single district laboring under peculiar disadvantages; or they may form the average of a general calculation which embraces every district.

In this latter case they would certainly go far to show that the law had failed to accomplish one of its chief objects, and ought to be modified. The Society have evidently had access to documents, from which these data have been drawn. We wish therefore they could at the same time have furnished us with a comparison of the number of estates brought to the hammer, through default, since the new law took effect, with the number usually put up to sale under the old system, as the feasibility of that public notice which they pray for, must depend in some measure on the number of notices to be thus issued. The more that number is multiplied, the greater is the chance that the sale will be vitiated by the non publication of some of them within the limited period. We believe there have been instances in which the sale of valuable estates—which require to be advertised—has been cancelled, and that recently, because the Judge did not bestir himself to affix the proclamation sent him in his Court, in due time. According to a recent decision of the Board, the non publication of a single notice within the time, not only nullifies the sale, but renders it necessary that the process of proclamation should begin de novo. If therefore any one, Thames or Mowatt should fail, stop whatever came, through neglect or collusion, to affix the notice, so that fifteen clear days do not elapse between the publication and the sale, the sale must be postponed for three weeks or a month, and the estate must thus remain without a proprietor for nearly two months; for all the proprietary rights of the old landlord cease from the moment he is declared a defaulter. The inconvenience to which this would subject the purchaser must be taken into consideration in any modification of the law.

This new system of sales was not promulgated without fear and trembling. It was a bold attempt to enforce patriotism among the most dilatory people perhaps on earth, at the risk, if it failed, of having half the estates of the country thrown upon the hands of Government, and the collection of the revenue embarrassed to an insupportable degree. The experiment has succeeded almost miraculously; but while its success hangs in suspense, it was not without reason that Government declined to encumber the experiment by making the publication of numerous notices indispensable to the validity of a sale. They might have proved to be so numerous as to render it impossible for the sales to proceed on the appointed day for want of due notice. The act might have broken down in the first quarter, to the great inconvenience of the public interests. There has now been more than a twelvemonth's experience of the operation of the law, and the object sought by the Society may be reconsidered with advantage. There may be objections of which we are not aware to the concession of this point; and it might endanger the principle of the new system; but in ignorance of any such arguments, we must give our vote for the restoration of the clausus, and the due publication of notices previous to the sale. It is but reasonable that the defaulter should receive as high a price as can be obtained for an estate, the loss of which deprives him of the means of support. It is desirable that the mortgagee should not lose the amount he has advanced on an estate. It is important to the interests of society, not less than of Government, that capitalists should be enabled to invest their money in land. It is one of the strongest arguments in favour of a secondary over a primary settlement, that the wealth which is accumulated in traffic or by economy, can be invested in the purchase of land; and whatever encourages this investment, must, from that circumstance recommend itself to Government. If it be a fact that under the operation of this law estates have fallen to the value of only two years and a half's purchase, it is very desirable that an effort should be made to relieve our fiscal administration from such an opprobrium. And as the request is reasonable, and offered from no factious motives, the mere fact that the alteration would gratify a large body of wealthy and respectable natives, is a strong argument in its favour, even if so large a number of the European officers of Government had not declared themselves strongly in favour of it.

DEPUTY MAGISTRATES.—We have at length the pleasure of seeing the draft of an Act for strengthening the Police, and Criminal branch of the Judicial Department by the appointment of Deputy Magistrates. It is now more than two years since the glaring defects of our police system were forced on the notice of Government, and more than four years since the Committee appointed to search for the cause and cure of the disease sent in their report. During this period we have conquered, lost, won, and abandoned Afghanistan; we have fortified and relinquished Herat; we have liberated Russian slaves at Khiva; dictated a peace to the Emperor of China under the walls of Nankin; and added Souda, fertile as Egypt, to the British territories. We have struck all Asia with surprise by the extent and magnitude of our enterprises. But we have not found either leisure or means for giving internal security to the people whose labour has furnished us, for the most part, with resources for these distant efforts. In the devotion of our national energies to foreign and dazzling expeditions, instead of to humble and but more useful reforms at home, the Government of India has only followed the footsteps of the Government of England, which is extending its influence to every quarter of the globe, while half its population is sunk into such a state of brutal ignorance as to be unable to write their names. The excuse is, that Government has had no time for domestic reformations; but this is only to say, in other words, that it considers them less important than the objects to which it has found time. If the mental improvement of the people at home, or the protection of property in India had been deemed a matter of paramount concern, it would have required no very long search to find both time and money for it.

The present enactment is very simple. It empowers the local Government to appoint unaccredited Deputy Magistrates, to perform either the Police or the Judicial functions of the Magistracy, leaving the distribution of their powers and the amount of their remuneration to the discretion of the local Authorities. This was evidently the first step in improvement. The country required an intermediate class of officers between the Dagga and the Commissioned Magistrate. It required functionaries of its order, to a larger extent than the peculiar organisation of the Civil service could furnish. To secure the services of such men, it was necessary to have recourse to the ability which the country itself presented. The best constructed system of reform must have been futile while Government was without the power of employing agents to work it. That power is now conferred on it by the Supreme Legislative authority in the country; and we shall now be happily enabled to hold the local Government "personally and individually responsible" to us Mr. Cobden's phrase,—for the establishment of an efficient Police. Nothing is now wanting but the heart to devote to this important branch of public duty, a sum equal to a fourth of the annual profits of its optimum speculations.

It is to be hoped that the power thus conferred on the local Government, will not be allowed to lie dormant, but that every district will be supplied with three or four Deputy Magistrates, to be stationed in the centre of small circles, so that they may be enabled completely to command them, and to allow nothing of importance to transpire in them without their knowledge. After having administered the Government of Bengal for more than twenty years, it is humiliating to think that we are nearly as ignorant of its internal condition, as on the day we took it into our own hands. Hitherto we have had no agency through which this valuable information could be collected. Our European functionaries have been for the most part stationary at particular places, the extent of their official duties has left them no leisure for acquiring a knowledge of the country committed to their charge, while the migratory habits which Government has anxiously encouraged, left them little desire for collecting information relative to districts which they were likely so soon to quit. The establishment of Deputy Magistrates will give us a class of men of superior attainments, whose official duties will give them every facility for collecting statistical facts in the circle which they will be required to perambulate. It is much to be desired that the collection of such facts, as shall enable us to legislate with light and knowledge, and not in the dark, will be made a part of their official duty. A list of every village in their beat, of the number of houses and residents, the occupations of the people; their respective castes and classes; the register of deaths, the number of pukka houses, (to mark the progress of wealth;) of the schools or Colleges it may contain; the number, character and allowances of the village by watchman, together with many other details, which might be gradually collected, without interfering with their magisterial duties, ought to exist in the office of each Deputy Magistrate; and if he be a man of intelligent and active mind, he will feel a pleasure in prosecuting these researches. There can be no question that this information would serve in no small degree to facilitate his official labours.

There is one error in the draft Act which will be doubled when it comes again under the notice of the Legislative Council. It restricts the appointments to Natives of India. The new offices ought however to be placed on the same footing as the office of unincorporated Judge, and thrown open to all classes, Europeans, East Indian and Native.

FEWEL COOLIES.—A notification has just been issued by order of the Deputy Governor, which states his surprise that the number of female coolies who have accompanied the Coolies recently sent to the Mauritius, does not exceed on an average fifteen per cent, and his determination to adopt more stringent orders for the selection of those coolies whose families are willing to go with them, if the disproportion is not rectified. It is worthy of observation, that while the general average of female emigrants is thus stated at fifteen per cent, we find, on reference to the valuable statement furnished by the Star, that the proportion shipped by each agent presents a very material diversity. The proportion of females to males shipped by

This difference may be the result of inattention, or of instructions from the island, but it is desirable that a more reasonable proportion should be enforced by public authority. It will be found advantageous to the Coolies themselves, by preventing some cheque on their immoral propensities; it will be still more important to the women and children who would otherwise be abandoned to destitution. It will also prove no less beneficial to the planters themselves, inasmuch as it will create inducements for the emigrants to remain after the period of their service has expired. We are happy to find that the subject has been taken up by the local Government in good earnest. Already have more than two thousand male labourers embarked without being accompanied by their families. Some of these may have been men without domestic ties, others may have been unmarried youths, but more than half of them consists of individuals who have left the country without making any provision for those whom they are bound to support, and have thus "abandoned their families to the parish." The evil which is perhaps inseparable from the system, should be reduced to the smallest possible amount.

The labourers who embarked for Demarara are returning in a body from thence, the period of their engagements having expired. They are represented as having saved on the average a hundred dollars a piece, and they might have saved more if they had been fairly dealt with by the planters. Their prospects in the island were very flattering, but they longed for home. "The poor Cooly sorrows," says a letter from Berlice, published in the Anti Slavery Reporter, "after his tawny kindred as much as do such of Europe's sons, whose length of residence here has not taught them to forget their home-lands." The proprietors of estates in that colony are blamed for their short-sighted policy in having neglected to ensure the emigration of the wives of the labourers and thereby insuring their continuance in a place "where their labour is rewarded a thousand fold beyond what it possibly can be in India." This circumstance may possibly induce the planters at the Mauritius to encourage rather than impede the efforts of Government to prevent the separation of the wife from the husband.

THE RECENT CASE OF CONTUMACY.—The arrival of the mail last week prevented our alluding to a case recently brought forward in the Providence, in which the wisdom and equity of our judicial institutions is deeply implicated. It appears that a dacoity was committed in the district of Bangalore, and an information lodged against one Chandan Taker as a party. The evidence to connect him with the robbery was that a gown suspected to be one of the stolen articles, was found in his house; but the gown could not be identified. As there appeared however to be sufficient cause of suspicion against him, the matter was referred to the Sudder Nizam Court in Calcutta, who ordered a Proclamation to be issued for his apprehension. Some months after, he was apprehended, and tried under Regulation IX. of 1808, found guilty of contumacy in not having surrendered himself, and under the provisions of that law was sentenced to imprisonment and transportation for life. He pleaded ignorance of the proclamation, and also absence on pilgrimage, but the plea was over-ruled; the sentence was confirmed by the highest Native Council, and the Government should interpose, he will soon fall a victim to a harsh and unjust sentence.

In this instance no blame attaches to the Zillah Judge or to the Nizam Court; they were bound by their oath to administer the law as they found it. It is the law itself which is in fault. It must not be forgotten, however, that the Regulation was passed, not with the view of establishing any principle of law, but to meet a particular emergency. Thirty-five years ago gang robbery had assumed to an alarming extent.

been taken up by the local Government in good earnest. Already have more than two thousand male labourers embarked without being accompanied by their families. Some of these may have been men without domestic ties, others may have been unmarried youths, but more than half of them consists of individuals who have left the country without making any provision for those whom they are bound to support, and have thus "abandoned their families to the parish." This circumstance may possibly induce the planters at the Mauritius to encourage rather than impede the efforts of Government to prevent the separation of the wife from the husband.

It was in reference to such a state of things that the law now under consideration was passed. It is a suspension, so to speak, of the Habeas Corpus Act. Severe and unjust though it be, it was mild in comparison with the Regulation passed thirty-five years before to meet a similar danger. On that occasion Mr. Hastings, with the view of extirpating gang robbery, ordered that the culprit should be executed, that the village in which he resided should be fired, and that his whole family should be sold into slavery. The provisions of these two laws may be taken as a fair index of the state of public feeling in our Government at successive periods. That which appeared reasonable and natural in 1778, was deemed harsh and unjustifiable in 1808; a provision, which in the opinion of the Supreme Council, was eminently proper in 1808, is repudiated as unjust and barbarous in 1843. Milder and sounder principles have gradually obtained an ascendancy in the public conscience during the last seventy years; and our legislation ought to bear the impress of this improvement. The law we suppose will be immediately modified. If not, it had not grown out of circumstances which have ceased to exist, there would be a sufficient argument for its legislative repeal in the fact, that we have outgrown the wisdom of the law, and can no more reconcile our minds to the transportation of a man for life for so atrocious a crime as that of not voluntarily surrendering himself while he is not yet suspected of character, than the framers of that law could think of selling the convicted felon's family into slavery.

SICKNESS AND MORALITY AMONG THE TROOPS AT BARRABETTOR.—We have been favoured with a valuable pamphlet on this subject by Dr. Finch, the Surgeon of the 57th Regiment, now stationed at that cantonment, and proceed to present a brief analysis of its contents to our readers.

The extent to which European troops among the troops at Barrackpore, has long been a subject of anxiety to the public authorities, and great thanks are due to Dr. Finch for the exertions he has made to bring the subject forward in a practical shape. He has selected for examination the state of three Regiments, the 3d, the 57th, and the 58th, and given us a comparative statement of the ratio of sickness and mortality in them during the three years previous to their arrival at Barrackpore, and the two years and four months of their residence there. In the 3d Regiment, the per centage of sickness during the years 1835, 1836 and 1837 in which they were stationed at Mysore, was respectively 44; 43 and 52. In the first year after it reached Barrackpore, the per centage rose to 64; in the second to 93, and in the first four months of the third year, to 28. The returns of the 57th Regiment present the same distressing results. It was stationed at Benares in 1835, '36, and '37, and the ratio of sick to the strength of the Regiment was respectively 46; 44 and 52 per cent. In 1838, when at Barrackpore, it rose to 63; in 1839 to 94, and in the first four months of 1840, had actually reached 53; that is, the number of sick during a third of the year was as great as at Benares during a twelve month. The reports from the 58th Regiment, are of the same character. Dr. Finch has been unable to obtain returns of the sickness in this corps while stationed in the Upper Provinces, and he has therefore taken three years of their residence at Jumnalpoor, a station in the humid climate and soil of Bengal. The ratio there was greater than among the troops stationed in the Western Provinces; but it bears no comparison to the ratio exhibited at Barrackpore. At Jumnalpoor the per centage of sickness was in three successive years, 53; 67; 55—low in the third year then, in the second. The same corps at Barrackpore in 1838 presented a per centage of 70; in 1839 of 97; and in the first four months of 1840 of 28.

It appears therefore that the extent of sickness increases with the length of time the troops are stationed at Barrackpore.

But it is in the ratio of mortality that the returns are most appalling. The 3d Regiment lost in thirty-six months at Mysore, 38 men; in twenty-eight months at Barrackpore, the casualties amounted to 107. The 57th Regiment lost 35 men in three years at Benares; it lost 120 in two years and four months at Barrackpore. The 58th Regiment lost at the Bengal station of Jumnalpoor, only 34 men in thirty-six months; and 181 in twenty-eight months at Barrackpore.

We gather from these and other data that the mortality among the Europeans at Barrackpore exceeds four fold that of the same regiments when stationed at other places; that the mortality increases according to the length of their detention at this encampment, having been in the three years, 48 in the first year, 180 in the second, and 140 in the first four months of the third year. We also learn that the casualties are greatest among the young soldiers than among those who have been inured to the hardships of a military life; and that of 941 casualties in a given time, 184 occurred among Europeans under the rank of sergeant.

This unwholesomeness and mortality are caused by Dr. Finch to be a combination of causes; and that the climate of Bengal, so different from that of the Western Provinces, is in a fact, entirely responsible for it; and that the climate is far more injurious to the soldiers than the West than to the Native. Every European who has a number of up-country servants in his employ, is struck off of this fact by the frequent changes among them, owing in a great measure to sickness. But this will not altogether account for the mortality. Jumnalpoor has nearly all the disadvantages of a Bengal climate. It has heat and moisture, and long continued rains against it; yet the 38th lost more than twice as many men in four months at Barrackpore than it did in three years at that station. We cannot altogether agree with Dr. Finch in attributing the sickness and mortality to the position of Barrackpore. In both seasons of the year, the wind comes from the north-east and south-west, over the broad expanse of a whole some river. In the cold weather it is subject to fog; but so is the rest of the country. The diet of the Europeans has been charged with half their sickness. It is quite possible that the deteriorated Atta which they purchase for the sake of cheapness, may not agree with them, and that the sudden change from wheat to rice, may be detrimental; but we are told that at Jumnalpoor they all took to rice, because it was very cheap, and yet enjoyed unimpaired health. The last campaign presented numerous instances in which Europeans were scinted in their meals for months; and very obliged to live on food to which that of Barrackpore would have been a luxury, but they were not disabled by sickness. The cheapness of fruit and the indiscrimination with which it is devoured, may justly be reckoned among the causes of disease. Neither is the water they drink without its influence on their health. Instead of resorting to the Ganges, the water of which is sweet and may be defecated for a trifle, they have imbibed a superstitious prejudice against it, and take only the water to be found in the tanks, which, at some seasons of the year, is unwholesome. The Europeans are also over-fitted, and in this lies perhaps much of the secret of their bodily complaints. "The Station and Regimental duties bear heavily on the men at Barrackpore, many of whom do not sleep in their huts for many successive nights, and are scarcely able to bear this continued call on them." In addition to the Station and Regimental duties, the troops are required to garrison Fort William, and to furnish guards for the public offices and buildings in Calcutta, where they suffer materially in their health. No conveniences are allowed them, and every arrangement seems as though it was designed to abridge and not prolong existence.

Some of these causes of disease Government has already begun to remove, and if we are not mistaken, much is due in this respect to the representations of Dr. Finch himself. The troops at Barrackpore are to be relieved biennially; and a large shed is to be erected for the guard at the side in Calcutta. Other causes may also be obviated. The foliage at Barrackpore may be curtailed; filth drains may be purified; and the public ponds guarded from impurities; neither is there any objection to a vigorous Medical Police in the encampment. But it is impossible to cast a glance at the huts, the hovels, rather the kennels in which the men live, without feeling that if every other element of disease and death were removed, these wretched buildings, would be enough to ruin the health of an army. The crying evil of the climate of Bengal is dampness, yet here the floor of the huts is damp even for nearly five months in the year. At the season when the sun starts down in the west, rays from above, as it were, a "damp" (p. 10); the earth extended with again, furnished from beneath its contribution of dampness to the elements of death. We do not say that if the Europeans' huts were raised beyond the influence of humidity, they would not die; but it is a matter of experience that Armenians in the grave of half the Regiments sent there, while the men continued to sleep on the floor, and that since they have been accommodated with elevated stages, such as the inhabitants of the province use, it has become almost a sanatorium.

DELHI RELIEF FUND.—We were favored some time back with a Brief Statement of the establishment, present condition and prospects of the Delhi Relief Society, which bears a strong resemblance in its constitution and object to the Calcutta District Charitable Society. The institution on its present footing originated in a Minute drawn up by the Officiating Magistrate of Delhi, on the 7th of July 1842. Its design is to promote a sufficient and well organized system of relief for the poor of Delhi and its environs, and of distressed travellers, with a view to repress vagrancy and the systematic practice of living on alms, on the part of able-bodied beggars; and to afford the Police an opportunity of removing beggars from the high roads by making provision for the relief of those who really need it. The Association has been formed through the efforts of the European gentlemen in the City, but they have spared no pains to interest the native gentry of Delhi in their plans, and to secure their active co-operation both in raising funds and providing for the judicious distribution of them. In these efforts they have been more successful than the Calcutta District Charitable Society. In Calcutta, the assistance of the Native community in the cause of benevolence, insignificant as it is, cannot be obtained without disheartening impatience; and it is withdrawn at the earliest opportunity. At Delhi, we find that the Committee of management originally formed, contained two European and eighteen Native gentlemen. Their attendance at the subsequent meetings of the Committee appears to have been very encouraging. Their contributions amount to 289 Rupees a month, while those of the European gentlemen at the station do not exceed 55 Rs. It is true, that the Europeans at Delhi bear no proportion to those in Calcutta, but we question whether the Native community in our metropolis is not possessed of greater wealth than the residents in the ancient capital; the alacrity with which they have come forward to support the institution is therefore deserving of more particular commendation. The Delhi Relief Society is, we think, the only association in India, in which all the proceedings are conducted and recorded in Oorloo.

The monthly receipts of the Society amount to about 275 and the disbursements to 245 Rs. The number of paupers who receive relief amounts to 138, at the rate of 1 Rs. 11 annas a month; but the scale of allowances is regulated by the price of grain; and at some periods it has been as low as a Rupee four annas a month. This is but a small allowance for the subsistence of an individual; but it is deemed sufficient by the native members, when the price of provisions is low. The present funds of the Society are however inadequate to the wants of the city; the registers of the bazaar show that a number of cases of mendicity remain to be enquired into; and small ample provision is made for those who are really destitute, the police can seemly intention was properly received by the city of the bazaar. The Committee have since been resolved to redouble their efforts to obtain large subscriptions; and some of its most influential Native members have agreed to take the lead in stimulating the middle class of society to assist it by their contributions. It is generally to be hoped that their efforts may be successful, and that Delhi may furnish an example to other cities in the North West Provinces of the ease with which systematic relief can be given to paupers, and the excess for street beggary removed.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 22.

—The Star announces the publication of the Juris, a new periodical work, which if it can be kept up with spirit, will prove beneficial to the public interests. Unfortunately all periodical publications in the department of Law, which have from time to time been announced in Calcutta, have having straggled their hour upon the stage, have dropped one after the other into oblivion. The subjects which this work is intended to embrace are: 1. Practical exposition of the law-mechanism. 2. Lectures, in a colloquial form, upon English jurisprudence. 3. Reviews of Acts of the Legislative Council of India, and of Acts of the Imperial Parliament, affecting India. 4. Notices of decisions in the Supreme Courts of the three Presidencies, which are of interest to the Mercantile Native community.

—A notification appears in the papers from the hands of the late Sir William Macgregor, requesting a meeting on Tuesday next, at the Town Hall, to consider the propriety of erasing by some lasting testimonial the names due to the memory of that distinguished man.

—The Governor of Selinde has appointed Lieut. Hathorne to the office of Magistrate of Hyderabad and Collector of Lower Selinde on the left bank of the Indus; Capt. Preedy to the post of Magistrate of Karsheba and Collector of Revenue in Lower Selinde on the right bank of that river; and Lieut. Pope to the charge of the Magistracy of Sukkur and the collection of the revenues of Sukkur and Herwa and the adjacent districts. The Government General has approved and confirmed these measures.

—The affairs of Kyral are settled; the old lady has fled and the country is in our possession. Not a shot was fired. On hearing of the insurrection, General Fane ordered 8500 men of all arms to the aid. Such a demonstration on such an occasion; such an apparent aiding the cause to driven a party, may seem ridiculous, but the object was evidently not so much to conquer Kyral, as to instil a feeling of wholesome dread into the minds of that class of chieftains, who are ungrateful for our protection, and anxious to be relieved from it. When they see what a force may be assembled at a day's notice, their hearts will melt within them. The whole of this grand army was on its way to Kyral, when dispatches arrived from Mr. Clerk to say that the business was over and that their services were no further necessary.

—Dost Mahomed was summoned some time ago having arrived at Peshawar. The Dohi Gazette now states, that a letter has been dispatched from the Lahore Court to Akbar Khan at Jallalabad, desiring him to receive his father with all due honor and submit to him in all things, because he had agreed to pay tribute to Sher Singh on condition of his relinquishing all claim on Cabul and Candahar. How long will the Dost pay the tribute to the British, says 23.

—An Anglo-Hindostani Society was founded at Bangalore, on the 11th of April, at a meeting of gentlemen convened at Cleveland House. It promises well. A large number of Europeans and an equal number of Natives have become monthly subscribers to the institution.

—Letters from Amrit state, that a little after 10 on the evening of the 7th instant, a small flock of about a hundred men, and a few women of a second flock more severe than the first. From the same source we learn that the numbers of the first group of ten for 1841 had commenced in the station of the Amrit group, that the specimens were very fine, and that there was every prospect of a large and excellent crop.

—The papers this morning give details of the deadly attack made by a number of Mohammedans, said to be connected with the Meddians or Mooslims College, on three constables who were sent to arrest a man of the name of Eastman. It is difficult from the accounts given to assign even a plausible reason for the outrage. It seems that they seized on the constables had beat them with sticks, as unmercifully, that these officers very narrowly escaped with their lives. It will be long before they are on their legs again. The case has been fully examined by Mr. Patton, the Chief Magistrate, and made over to the Sessions.

—The Englisman alluded some time since to the circumstance that the Scipio Revere Crawford had not been heard of since July last. A letter appears in this day's Englisman, stating that a brother of one of the Native servants who went in the ship had received a letter from him stating that the ship struck on the Andaman islands, the inhabitants of which were cannibals, and that he was the only person saved.

SATURDAY, APRIL 23.

—Our contemporaries are discussing the effects of the new order in Council brought out by the last mail, which forbids English ships to proceed to any port in China, except the five ports mentioned in the treaty, under a penalty of 100*l*. or three months' imprisonment. This order, if strictly executed, cannot but affect the prospects of the Opium trade, the gains of the smuggler are derived mainly from the facility with which he can run his small craft into the numerous minor ports which that long line of coast presents. Before the penalty is inflicted, however, it will be necessary to catch the delinquents, and this cannot be done without cruisers, and cruisers cannot be maintained on that coast without money. Is England or China to pay for this preventive service? We are happy to see our brethren of the press adopting the opinion which we have long held; that the Government of India has no right to prohibit the cultivation or exportation of the drug; or to lend its assistance to other nations to prevent its entering their ports; but that Government ought not to be personally, still less, exclusively engaged in raising an armistice with the full knowledge that it is intended for a country where it is contraband. Government should give up the monopoly and impose a duty, no matter how heavy, at the point of export.

—In reference to the case of search on the constables, we now learn that the channels of the division made no effort to remove the unfortunate men; that he came up tardily, and acted inefficiently; and that instead of sending them forthwith to a Hospital he took them to his own house; under the pretence of taking down their deposits. It is to be hoped that if this fact be proved, the Magistrate will exact a remedy.

—The Englisman states, that a messenger reached him of Lord Ellenborough's having actually forwarded the resignation of his office of Governor-General; but the announcement is evidently premature.

—The Agri Dikher Extra gives us a copy of a despatch from Sir Charles Napier to Lord Ellenborough, assuming the occupation of Orissa without resistance. The river was crossed rapidly at Hyderabad, and the Governor did not deem it prudent to go further than to Marwar.

—The Englisman states, that a messenger reached him of Lord Ellenborough's having actually forwarded the resignation of his office of Governor-General; but the announcement is evidently premature.

—The Englisman was disheartened by the news that Capt. Brown, of the Bengal Native Infantry, who had been sent to Marwar, had been sent back for his Lordship's orders, which were to be sent and occupy the fort. Every plan of the smallest note in Selinde is now in our possession, and the country is at our mercy—as was Afghanistan once.

MONDAY, MAY 1.

—Some ugly rumors were about last week relative to the immediate prospect of a renewal of the war in China; but the arrival of intelligence yesterday to the 9th of March has dispelled them. The Imperial Commissioner Elepe is dead. He expired somewhat suddenly; as the son of one of the living members, at a very advanced age. In consequence of his demise the commercial negotiations will be suspended, until another Commissioner with equal powers has been appointed from Peking. It is expected that Keying, a near relative of the Emperor, will be selected for that office. Sir Henry Pottinger had intimated to him that should he be nominated, His Excellency would, after the arrival of Col. Malleson, be prepared to proceed to the northward and give him a meeting at Ningpo or Shanghai. This movement is likely to facilitate the negotiations, as all the preliminary enquiries at Canton have been completed.

—The Strait Messenger states, that Government is understood to have decided on stationing a Regiment and four Companies immediately at Singapore, that reinforcements may be had in case of any emergency in China. The Queen's troops now in Singapore will, it is understood, be shortly placed on the Colonial establishments of the Crown, whence they will be sent which they have been lately receiving. When the troops in reserve at Singapore, at a Company's settlement, be placed on the same footing, or will they enjoy the advantage usually given to troops serving in the Straits? If so, will their allowances be reduced to the level of Crown pay when they are sent to China; or will they enjoy the higher allowances of the Company, while their brethren in arms enjoy only the lower emoluments of the Queen's services?

—The last Sunday papers announce the arrival there, and the debarkation of six of the Amers who have fallen from the dignity of sovereign princes to the humble condition of permanent prisoners of state. We have placed the passage among our selections.

—Khyal has fallen into our hands without a blow. On the approach of our troops the villages were deserted and Khyal abandoned. It is not said what has become of the villagers; but the head rebel Taj Singh and four hundred men, two guns, and three hundred loads of treasure. He was pursued by a thousand of the Peshwa Raja's Horse and overtaken. The letters from that quarter, published in the papers, state that the whole of the Saltah Protected States are ready to rise and relieve themselves of the burden of our protection.

—The 9th Regiment, which Lord Ellenborough dispatched to Selinde on hearing of the first victory, has arrived at Sukkur. Colonel Patten has been removed from the command of the 9th Bengal Cavalry, and a junior officer ordered to succeed him with all speed to take the command of it. No extreme measures towards an officer, who has twice shared in the honors of the field within the last two months, appears unwarrantably exacted on a charge of incapacity or imbecility, and these charges it is hard to substantiate by a Court-martial.

—Mr. George Abbott, a young man engaged in mercantile pursuits, and held in high estimation, was struck dead by lightning on Saturday last, while on his way to his office. The Star states that he was riding in company with Mr. D. Jenkins, who only a few paces ahead of him, and who on passing the vivid flash, started, and continued to ride on.

burner, Adjutant 3d Light Cavalry, to report to you the appearance of the enemy. Lieutenant Moore's troop made a spirited charge on the enemy's advance, but at too great a distance to reach them before they had secured themselves in the bed of the river.

the enemy were advancing in force, on which I halted the column, with the right resting on the Phœbe, and detached two guns under Captain Rowan, a squadron 3d Light Cavalry under Captain Maher, and the Grenadier company 5th Regiment under Captain Morris to check their advance; at this time the enemy were crossing the bed of the Phœbe in great numbers both horse and foot, about 3-4ths of a mile to our left rear in the direction of our baggage, which was in the rear of the column; large bodies were drawn up in front of a wood on the opposite side of the river; and heavy masses were seen with a glimpse to their left rear, and advancing towards the head of the column.

The guns took a position nearly opposite the point where the enemy were crossing the bed of the river, and opened upon them with such effect that they were instantly shocked; a few more rounds telling, the thousand-runners, they retreated with precipitation, and recrossed the river much more rapidly than they had advanced; in their retreat they carried with them all those who were ranged in front of the wood. The large bodies in the distance also fell back, and in about half an hour after the opening of our guns there was not a man there.

Captain Jacob's horse having arrived from Hyderabad, about the time our fire ceased, I directed them to cover the rear of the columns, and recalled our detached parties to join the main body : by this time the baggage being well in advance I resumed the march, and arrived in camp without the slightest loss of any sort.

Apr. 5. Apr. 6. Apr. 7.
At Mr. Latta. This town is 20 miles from the field of battle. We passed two prepared positions of great strength. I shall reach Meerpoor to-morrow. The British are under arms, and the desert is in great terror, and all their family with them. The inhabitants receive us with great joy, and are very desirous to be assured that we mean to keep the country.

The poona horse has pursued the Amer and are now near Meerpoor, 40 miles from the field.

Sudder's servants (and the great mover of his killed force) was Locha Mahomed Seetee; he stood in the battle, and was his followers that followed the 25th regiment. Three other chiefs have fallen, Golem Ali, Alpoor, Ali Khan Talpoor and Jaffa Khan Nary.

RELIGIOUS.
DR. VAUGHAN AND THE ADVANCEMENT OF THE REFORMATION.—But if Christianity has done much to foster the spirit which declares that every man should be a freeman, and that woman should be his companion, and not his slave, it has done much more than the era of the Reformation, to strengthen all present impulses of that nature, by calling upon men, without respect of persons, to become, in the future, more teachers and less slaves, in all matters of religious opinion and religious duty. * * * It taught a people, who seemed to have nothing to do in religion, except to be obedient of its laws, to feel as though they had everything to do in it, if their observance of laws was to be bound of the slightest value. Also who had been taught to lean entirely on the priesthood of others, were admonished, that as they hoped to be saved, it would be better to become their own priests. In this manner, it set forth a new doctrine in respect to human right and human duty, based on new terms in regard to human capability. It raised men from a condition of mere passiveness in the hands of the sacerdotal ministers of religion, and required him to set with the intelligence and seriousness proper to a being considered as a personal accountable man to God. * * * It was no meaning that men should learn to regard themselves as competent to pursue the course which had been thus marked out for them in respect to religion, insomuch as it would prevent them to look with a new intelligence on many other matters, which, in common with religion, had been long accounted as subjects greatly above their capacities. It meant that men should be enabled to consider themselves after this manner with regard to religion, was it not reasonable that they should learn to consider themselves in the same manner with regard to the questions of civil government? If the church could err—and err so fatally, might not the state also err—and err so less fatally, and could it be proper that the right to judge concerning the measures, should be entrusted to the less? Religion and government are the great questions of society, and the principle which covers a right to take cognizance of these, covers a right to take cognizance of every other one. It is the fact that the principle of the Reformation carried with it these seeds of general improvement, that has given rise to so much importance in the view of all made intelligent of the progress of the age. It was as well to wakefulness on one great subject, and a call made with such earnestness, that it could not fail to induce a habit of wakefulness in respect to many other subjects of importance.

These, it seems to us, are the characteristic merits of the Reformation, its claims to admiration and respect. The dispute was not properly a dispute about texts, a dispute concerning a few verses of Holy Writ, or a repudiation of that tradition; it was a stand made in favour of religion against priestcraft, of the free service of God against the passive-obedient slavery of man,—and the spirit and essence of rebellion against the quibbles and quiddities of a degenerate philosophy—or to sum up all, of civilization against barbarism and degradation. Such a view of the Reformation will alone do it justice; and by thus regarding it, our mankind be secured against the whole source which on every side bears a less philosophical and comprehensive aspect of its disfigurement with the old church.

We do not think that Dr. Vaughan has at all oversteered this part of his case; he has, on the contrary, somewhat oversteered it, inasmuch as he has not been so far as the first spread of Christianity, and in resuming its followers from persecution. He has not even sufficiently the bearings of commerce on the rise and progress of the Reformation, but by thus resorting to it, falls somewhat into the common error of making some for its cause.

The effect of this new spirit upon commerce, and upon the kind of civilization which has to enter in upon these cities, has been very conspicuous. Just before the commencement of the reformation, the commerce of Europe was in the hands of the Portuguese. During the progress of that struggle, Spain became the seat of commercial ascendancy. But no more do we see Protestantism acquire stability and power in Europe, than we see the civil industry, the manufacturing skill, the commercial enterprise, the colonial enterprises, and the naval power of Europe go over almost entirely, to the side of the professors of the new faith, and the commerce of Europe has been twice thus combined, in the main, to our own time.

Was the liberating power of Protestantism which it infused into the Protestantism to assert their independence in the face of the most powerful hostility on the part of Spain and her allies; and which enabled the people to place an effectual check on the ambition of Louis XIV., even while the half of Europe was at his bidding, * * * Portugal, Spain, and Italy, have continued their adherence to the old faith, and to the day they are the victims of the old despotisms. Hence, upon the continent, the new spirit has been making every sort of progress, with unprecedented rapidity, during the last three centuries, and during that period those kingdoms have not been merely stationary, but in most respects retrograding. * * * We do not hesitate, therefore, to allege, that the weakness of the social current in Europe is on the side of Catholicism, and that its strength is on the side of Protestantism.

How all this is only partially true, either in fact or in theory. The spirit of the Reformation during the Middle Ages, was simply aggrandizement of the Church and of Clergymen; and it lent itself to liberty or to tyranny, indifferently, as best served his own weakness and purpose; to tyranny or to liberty, only as that most commonly amalgamated with its selfish designs. At the time of the Reformation, sacerdotalism was closely allied to monarchism; and the two combined were hostile to every social movement, that of commerce among the rest. But where did the Reformation find the lever with which it worked? In the active and inquisitive mind of commercial communities. It was, indeed, State, rather than Church management, which warred against Portuguese and Spanish commerce; and if that proved itself the stronger, it was because commerce was already in the saddle. But in Italy, and in the North, where civil tyranny was worst, commerce thrived unobscured by Popery; and when the moment of religious reform came, it was in such a position, that commercial activity, that Protestantism found to resist dissimile, and its principal barriers against the invasions of civil and religious persecution.

In our notice of Dr. Taylor's work on manufactures, published in the Friend of India, we referred to some striking instances of the strong and direct influence of great aggregations of man as of manufacturing in the progress of the development of civilization itself. But besides this market encouragement, the utility of the great town in diffusing knowledge is (as we have stated) not less important. Dr. Vaughan, more, put these truths in a more didactic form.

"The great agency in calling forth man's capabilities, whether for good or for evil, is that of his fellows. The picturesque, accordingly, may be with the country, but the intellectual, speaking generally, must be with the town. Agriculture may possess its science, and the farmer, as well as the landowner, may not be devoid of intelligence; but in such countries, the science and intelligence, in common with the improvement of the soil, must be derived, in the main, from the studies prosecuted in cities, and from the wealth which the traffic of cities affords. It is not followed by tillage, and tillage is made to partake of the nature of a study and a science, these signs of improvement are peculiar to lands in which cities make their appearance, and they become, and they become, in this sense a little venture to change the language of our poet a little, and say, 'Man makes the country, where art is, and it is not the town'—and it is not the town, but a much nearer approach toward the truth."

In a few short paragraphs on the influence of great cities on physical science, the author touches on one of the best of the Reformation's actions, respecting the democratic influence.

"It may be that the United States will be expected to, as affording striking evidence of the few mechanical routes to which all science is reduced, in proportion as the elements of society become more and more degenerate. It should be a sufficient answer to such persons, to remind them that the republican institutions of Athens, so far from being incompatible with a high state of civil refinement, have contributed to render that city the model of all cities in respect to science."

In the history of the United States the useful has hitherto very naturally taken a marked precedence of the ornamental, partly from the youth of the States themselves, and partly from the fact that European civilization is in this respect in its infancy to North America, everything new in British civilization being at the service of the Anglo-American people so soon as it becomes known among ourselves. Down to this time, it has been enough that the people of the United States should apply the stores of knowledge placed conveniently at their disposal. Of America, we have only to say, that it is in the infancy of its will, though far deeper, in common with all states in which the commercial spirit becomes predominant, will continue to be on the side of looking to the profit, and not to its relation to science and profit, and too little in relation to its less obvious and wider results. The great check upon this tendency will be found in the general intelligence of her people; in the necessary increase of wealth and level of life among them; and in the national pride, which will always be much affected by the consciousness of the deficiency in art, or in science.

In allusion to the "tyrant spirit" of the American states, Dr. Vaughan makes some shrewd observations:—

"It is to be denied that among ourselves there is this evil spirit. Every one knows that our great landmarks make us approve, for the most part, of allowing their claims in favour of their particular office. And which is the more needed acknowledgment in this shape, which it inflicts on the slave dependent upon it. By these means, in a great measure, our people are broken up into parties, and the mass committed to one side has to lay his account with such social hostility from the other. Our laws do not punish independence in politics or in religion, but society does. We have not any great majority, but we have in the place of it, tyrannical classes, and tyrannical parties. In a multitude of instances we see that talent fails to be appreciated, character comes to be despised, and the best minds, in looking comparatively, substantiate—all are hindered when men dare to commit themselves to a decided course in regard to some of their duties. We have not any great majority, but we have from these indirect modes of oppression, more than from any positive law, that freedom of opinion is injured."

The summing up, too, is worth notice:—

"But it must not be forgotten, that with all the faults of an ill-regulated state-spirit, men would possess few opinions worth contending about, and still less freedom of opinion, were there no class. Political science, taking in the great moral questions belonging to good government, finds its birthplace in cities, and in all birthplace only will it be found to make hopeful advances toward maturity. Its aim should be to discountenance tyranny in every form—the tyranny of opinion, no less than the tyranny of law, or of the purse. It aims at the goal of all civil improvement, namely, how to respect the opinions of all. It is not perfect, but it is a great good—incalculably greater, when compared with the ignorance, the barbarism, the moral and social evils which exist in the absence of it. We are its fault, but all faults are comparative, and in that setting forth the defects and vices often attendant on some of the best forms of civilization, we do not make slight objections to it, but much greater social evils which must belong to the condition of the people who do not build cities. Our aim is not to command barbarism, but to improve civilization, and to that end we would deal with it faithfully."

The sophism in this, and all similar arguments, lies in contrasting the baseness of evil attributable to cities, with the baseness of evil attributable to the country, and at least with an assumed state of society, in some stage of that opposite's influence. In seizing the evil, the argument sinks the important element of the good, and in consequence, the important element of the other way. In praising disposition, men instead the poor people of Athens, or the reigns of the Trajans, and carefully to make slight objections to it, but much greater social evils which must belong to the condition of the people who do not build cities. Our aim is not to command barbarism, but to improve civilization, and to that end we would deal with it faithfully."

But it is time to pause. If our quotations have not produced a desire to read the book, their attention will equally fail to do so. In Dr. Vaughan's survey of his subject, there are few of the influences of great cities on which he has not touched. With respect to education we find him (as might be expected) more favourable to popular, than to governmental institutions; and we think him as far right in the latter as in the former. He is in favour of a strong drive among the people for information; he is, as elsewhere, the old-servant principle is immediately applicable. His remarks on the Prussian system, though somewhat one-sided, are worth more than passing attention, in the present state of public opinion, which sees rather violently in favour of the short cuts, and the six false opinions, of arbitrary sovereignty, in search of improvement.—Albionian.

MICHAELMOOR.

CHURCH'S HOSPITAL.—A General Court of the Governors of Church's Hospital was held at their Hall on Monday, the 27th inst. The Rev. Mr. Peck, the Mayor, presiding, to accept their humble but hearty thanks for her royal munificence, in the gift lately presented by her to that institution (1,000*l.*) as a treasure of the institution, which is a very feeling address, moved the thanks of the meeting, and was a most singular fact.—That since the institution was founded by the youthful sovereign, Edward VI., no sovereign of this country has done more for the hospital, than this excellent institution. It remained for our present most gracious and youthful Queen to further by her munificent gift the benevolence of the youthful founder.—Peck.

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S PLAN OF CHURCH-EXTENSION.—The Globe of last Thursday says, "Sir Robert Peel has adopted, as the basis of his church-extension scheme, the principle that in 1835, when the population was 16,000,000, there were 10,000 churches, and when it was proposed by the Whig Government as a leading feature of a plan for abolishing church rates."

And the Morning Chronicle of Saturday says, "Sir Robert Peel has explained away to nothing the promise of church-extension which he made last year."

Thus we are disappointed, and we are very feelingly, by the one, that Sir Robert Peel is going to do nothing, and by the other, that he is going to do more, or entirely, the same thing which the Whigs proposed. And which he has done, and which he is doing. Now, these two representations are most contradictory. Sir Robert Peel is about to offer to the

Upon this point, the Reviewer, like every body else, has something more than misgivings. The "savage" phrase of pseudo-reform of the Governor-General, his financial policy, and his measures have made him almost as ridiculous, as his attempts to dispense the administration of his predecessor render him odious. All India laughs at him," but, it is remanded, "that he is spreading his net only for the poor, and that he is so pleasant, if it goes on." He has affronted and disgusted the Civil Service,—"a most powerful official oligarchy," by whose interests, however, he is far from being, he must contend the Government; and this, not by unpopular yet honest measures of reform, but by gratuitous, objectionable and insane. "Unwise remembrance of the past," writes the Reviewer, "Lord Ezzarman has equally alienated and disgusted the Court of Directors. But his Proclamations, and, above all, his General Order on the restoration of the Secular-world Gate to the His temple of Somnath, seem to have brought public opinion as to his dangerous interference and general unfitness, to absolute unanimity. Nor will the approval of the disloyal approval of the greatest authority alive, save them from unshaking decision and contempt now, and throughout all posterity." That approval, indeed, has been expressed only in reference to the past, and not to the future, and the contrast which related to the orders issued to the Commanders, and the provision made for the advance of the troops. No one disputes his Lordship's claim to the merit of having evaded himself of his position, and the pretensions made by his predecessor, and acted as a good Commander General, which was all that was left to do, after he had given permission to the Governor to address the troops, and to the Reviewer in other respects, the public will form their own opinion; and will no more accept the Duke of Wellington's affirmation as evidence of the noble Lord's political competence, than will the Reviewer accept Lord Buxarham for his eminent piety. Nor, having commended his administration with admiration, below the world, the policy of the late Governor-General, and Lord Ezzarman's complaint of being judged by the same judgment, and meted with his own measure. "Use the memory of thy predecessor fairly and tenderly," is the sage advice of Lord Bacon; "for, if thou dost not, it is a debt which will sure be paid when thou art gone."—Pat.

THE POPE AND THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.
Rome, Feb. 7.—It is certain that His Holiness professes in protest against all the innovations made in the church by the Emperor of Russia; and that he rejects all offers of arrangement which entitle the re-establishment of the church of Poland in the ancient status quo.—Id.

PORTUGAL.—We have received Lisbon news to the five inst., brought by the Iberia steamer, Lord Howard de Walden, that it is now, appear, received instructions from England to break off the negotiations for the tariff convention; the British Government not being disposed to accept the late Portuguese proposition, nor to lose further time in the matter. The Portuguese appear to have anticipated this result; and, while keeping up high duties to protect their manufactures, the Fabry Government are striving to pacify and bolster up the Douro interests by grants of public money.—Id.

THE CAPE COLONY.—We have received Cape Town news to the 24th of December, which furnish occasion for recalling public attention to the affairs of that important but neglected Colony.

Of the lack of wisdom on the part of the Government, or of public spirit people of the good of the Cape Town, or of both united, a very prodigious illustration is afforded by the fact, that the property of the Cape Town, and its remaining portion of a metropolis, are placed in jeopardy of ruin by a road across the Dorens. This is at present the all-engrossing subject. The discovery, that the farmers in the interior are setting for other purposes more to be answered, to avoid the necessity of transporting their produce across "a gulf of sand," which renders it necessary to employ eighteen oxen to draw 2,000 lbs. of wool—has led to high armed and armed resistance, and has partitioned to be allowed to raise money for the day, by a rate levied on fixed property, and to collect tolls for its future maintenance. Various plans have been hitherto proposed for carrying this object into effect,—by Government or by joint-stock companies; but they have all fallen to the ground. When the "compensation money" was beginning to flow into the Colony to an amount far beyond the necessities of the moment, and the question that perplexed the brains of capitalists, was, what should be done with the superabundance of money, when interest was less than time rent, and a large amount of money was locked up in the Government coffers,—it was proposed to form a joint-stock company, with a capital of a million, to be called the Cape Town and Port Elizabeth Stock Land Road, and Emigration Company. In the end of this, we are told, the money was "laid out in tobacco and silk," and served only to ex- in a spirit of of luxury and extravagance. We suspect that, if the application of the compensation money could be traced to its results, it would, in nearly every instance, be found to have been so fruitless as any loan to the West India Colonies, as to the Cape, so far as regards the permanent interests of the Colonists.

At the Cape, however, matters have now come to the point, that not only of Road or no Road, but of Town or no Town. "Cape Town," remarks the South African Advertiser, "exists but as the port of the country, which it is fast ceasing to be,—or as the turning point, which, if its compensation contract and importance declines, it will also soon lose to be but one remedy; a Road to serve as a bridge between the Cape and the interior, and to the protective duties. The main line of the proposed road is "from Salt-river House to Tygerberg, where it is to divide, one branch running to the Eerste River, and another turning to the left towards the river Paur; it is also proposed to carry other branches to Keelburg and Stellenbosch. The Cape Town traders have, indeed, used to be their business and shake off their financial shackles. The improvement of their port is not less necessary than that of the means of transit by land; and they must look for a growing rivalry on the part of the eastern districts.

The most dangerous element is most distressing: The continued drought in Caffraria had led to a serious loss of cattle; and, the principal estimation of the natives being milk, numbers had died from lack of food, and the result had been to furnish to the resident political agents to furnish the sufferers with food at the public expense; and private liberality was also contributing to alleviate the distress.

But the most important subject relates to the insurgent spirit of the Boers beyond the Orange River, whose proceedings had occasioned the Lieutenant-Governor suddenly to march in that direction with large forces of men, and horses, and arms. The Boers were to follow. There now now no mistake as to the only course now to the Cape Government. The accounts from Natal represent the Boers as openly declaring their determination, as soon as the winter truces concluded with Captain Clocse should be at an end, to drive the English out of their territories. The Frontier Times states, that "they have also declared that if the Government interfere between them and the natives, or in any way, they will invade the Colony. They are parcelling out the lands they have seized, and are issuing titles de facto. Patricians in New Zealand, the Commander of the country govt of the Orange; and a Detachment of the name of Clocse has been raised to the same bad end, and probably by equal means, amongst the Orange River Boers. They have demanded that they create their own, without recognition; and the native tribes or chiefs are in future to hold their own territories as vassals of the Dutch Republic. The Boers are now forming a new republic, and we refrain for the present to mention, but, it is said, requested assistance from the Government; stating that, unless it be speedily sent him, he will be compelled against his will to become a traitor. In the meantime, we hear that the Boers within the Colony are leaving, and still preparing to expatriate themselves in great numbers."

The immediate cause of the present movement, the South African Advertiser says, are "a certain overt act on the part of the Boers in Adam Kok's District of the Griqua country, and open preparations for an attack on Philipolis; and the discovery of certain proceedings on this side the river, by which the peace of the country and the safety of the inhabitants have been seriously threatened. Rumour and probability connect the Boers with corresponding movements on the part of the Boers at Natal. They have, from end to end of that territory, resolved on savage independence; and Government has at last begun to see that open rebellion and hopeless hostility, that concessions only inflame, like oil poured on fire—increasingly require.

"The Griquas, not only those under Kol, but also those under the leadership of the various bodies of Boers who look up to Waterboer as the friend and ally of the Colony, and as their protector; and numerous native chiefs and tribes among whom Christianity has been making its way, and who, as well as the security of this Colony and the honour of the British name, depend now on the conduct of Col. Hare. Simultaneous action on Natal, Colerberg, and the Orange River, is required. A quick and rebellion, not, probably, without blood, but chiefly in the blood of the guilty. Government has in hand, or within its reach, force sufficient for such action. This all the civilised nations and men of shrewdness and sense, and justly, any thing approaching to failure, either to military incapacity, cowardice, (we use right words, as we mean as we say.)"

The occupation of Port Natal will now be forced upon the British Government. It has been too long delayed, but it was no longer necessary, for the sake of the Colony, to delay the execution of the native tribes. We shall await with some anxiety the next dispatches. The latest intelligence will be found in another column.—Pat.

ABYSSINIA.—The Allegiance-Review gives, in a late number, some interesting information from the interior of Africa. Baita Agura, it seems, had made himself master of the country of Tigrai, where he had put an end to the plundering practices of a number of petty chiefs, who had known how to turn the disorders of the times to their advantage. Among other notable characters, a certain Gebel Mariani, who, under the reign of Ubia, had allowed himself many excesses against the European residents, and particularly against the English missionaries, is represented "to have received the reward of his crimes." His hands and feet were cut off, and he survived this mutilation only a few hours.

Baita Agura, mentioned above, is a descendant of the celebrated Ras Valdeia Selassie, and was interested with the government of a large portion of Tigrai by Ubia, when the latter set out on his hostile expedition against the Ras. The descent of the governor, and a direct exercise of justice, which served at the same time to rid him of a number of his most dangerous rivals, made him extremely popular, so that he found it an easy matter to extend his authority over the whole of Tigrai.

The Copie Abba, the head of the Abyssinian Church, after a short residence in the country, has completely changed his system of conduct towards the Europeans. The Emperor, who has been succeeded by the most marked civility and consideration. He accompanied the Baita Agura, Mr. Blane, a certain rank, distance, when the latter left Gondar, a number of his adherents in the country where the Abba is looked on as the representative of Christ on earth. He allowed the Emperor to visit him, and he, in turn, enjoyed every by the Emperor of Gondar. A wish is, however, expressed, that the Abba would moderate his too impatient behaviour, which may also draw down upon him the anger of the Emperor, and, by the bye, of nearly all his predecessors, of whom very few have come to a natural death.

Speaking of the European travellers in Abyssinia, the writer says: "Nearly half of them have now returned to Egypt. The way of the sea; the French travellers, Gallier and Verret, and the Englishman Bell, over Massana. Among those who have remained, none enjoys more popularity than William Schimper. All the accounts of him, and an agree in stating that this indefatigable German naturalist is rendering the most important services to science and humanity. He has discovered a system of determining the position of the mountains, and the extent of the territory, in the south of Abyssinia, i. e. in the kingdom of Shoa, the English mission is diligently at work. Two Barabaras are attached to it, a physician and a painter. The missionaries, Krapf and Schimper, together with a third, lately left this on their way thither. The return of Mr. Krapf from Shoa, through the country of Galla, betokens, in a geographical point of view, to the most interesting excursion undertaken of late years, his route having lain, for the greater part, through districts not supposed to have before been traversed by Europeans. He was robbed on his way, stripped to his skin, and escaped death only by a narrow flight undertaken barefooted, and almost in a state of nudity. His narrative when published will, no doubt, meet with great favour from the public, on account of the information he was enabled to obtain through his ultimate knowledge of the native language, his correct judgment, and his freedom from prejudice."—Id.

The same letter says, that M. Fresnel, distinguished by his discovery of the New Hymn in languages, and by several works of high merit in illustration of Arabic literature, had, a few days previously, left Cairo for Jeddah, having been appointed French Consul at Jeddah at the latter place.—Pat.

THE AFFGHAN CAMPAIGN OF 1843.

THE BLUE BOOK, of which we have received a copy, consists of five hundred and forty-seven public documents, and includes both the military despatches of our officers, and the instructions which were issued by the Executive Government. We are thus enabled to trace with a degree of confidence the impression created on the public Authorities by the successive development of events, and the measures which were pursued by them during this critical period of our Indian History. The Book also affords us an opportunity of correcting some of the erroneous opinions which were current at the time and which were adopted, more or less, by the conductors of the press. In the notices we now offer, it will be our aim to discuss the subject with strict impartiality and without any reference to the representations we ourselves may have given on imperfect information. We must however premise, that many documents of no small importance to a right understanding of the subject have been omitted or withheld, and that we are still left in some instances to our own conjectures; but whether the suppressed documents would have been more favourable to Lord Auckland or to Lord Ellenborough, it is not for us to say.

The first intelligence of the insurrection reached Mr. Clerk on the 16th of November, and he ordered three Regiments, which had been warned for service in Afghanistan, the 83d, the 90th, and the 94th to cross the Sutledge and proceed with all haste to Peshawar. Advertising to the request made by Capt. Mackeson that "the Brigade which had been warned for the Cabul Relief" should be urgently despatched, he did not request that it should be accompanied by cavalry or artillery; and he left it to the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief, then in the Western Provinces, to whom an express was sent on the 17th November, to decide on this important point. The orders issued by Sir Jasper Nicolls on the matter thus referred to him, are not published in the Blue Book, but the first Brigade marched without either cavalry or artillery. To the three Regiments enumerated above was added the 30th Native Infantry; and the four corps were concentrated at Peshawar by the end of December.

Information of the out-break reached the Governor General in Calcutta about the end of November. The first despatch which alludes to it, is dated the 2d December, and the only message which it authorized in the emergency which had arisen was the concentration of an effective brigade at Peshawar; the commander of which was directed not to advance to Cabul, except "in view to an object of pressing and vital importance to the safety of the troops at that place." The next day, the 9d of December, intelligence from Cabul of the 9th of November, of a more disastrous character reached Calcutta on which Lord Auckland informed the Commander-in-Chief that it had not altered the views contained in the letter of the preceding day; that nothing more was to be effected than to complete one effective brigade at Peshawar, "so as to give succour to our troops in the event of their retreating." At the same time the Governor General stated that "in the extreme event of the Military possession of Cabul and the surrounding territory having been lost, it was not his intention to direct new and extensive operations for the re-establishment of our supremacy throughout Afghanistan." It thus appears that within one week after the Supreme Council had been informed of the insurrection, it was resolved to relinquish our connection with the country beyond the Indus, and to retire "deliberately and under such arrangements as should leave some political influence in the country," but still to resist from it; and the commanding officers were directed to shape their proceedings with a view to carry these intentions into effect. Whatever merit or demerit therefore may be attached to the determination to abandon our supremacy in Afghanistan, belongs primarily to Lord Auckland's administration. It was evidently in reference to these despatches that Sir Robert Peel asked Lord John Russell, "Who contemplated the abandonment of Afghanistan? I could tell him."

In the letter of the 3d Dec. the Governor General declared himself opposed to the despatch of a second Brigade. But on the 5th, he wrote to the Commander-in-Chief to approve of the despatch of two Brigades, and to request that the command of the army of relief might be entrusted to General Lumley. On the same day a despatch was sent to Sir W. Macnaghten, which he never received, which alludes to the provision made by Government "for the contingency of our political influence in that quarter being for a time entirely subverted;" but the nature of this provision—the abandonment of Afghanistan—was not mentioned. At the same time the Envoy was informed of the efforts which have been made to send troops to Peshawar, and he was told that they would move according to the directions which he and General Elphinstone might issue. On the 26th November, Capt. Mackeson, in a letter from Peshawar, informed Mr. Madock that intelligence had been received from Cabul of the 14th, and Jellalabad of the 21st, and that our troops were in a most critical position. From his letter Governor appears for the first time to have been informed that the insurrection was universal; that "from whatever beginning it arose, it had become general throughout the country; and that the population had not stopped to enquire in favour of whom they were rising; it was sufficient that the object in view was to rid themselves of the Kafirs—to expel the Fringes from Afghanistan."

We have remarked that the first Brigade was sent out without the equipment of artillery. This fatal omission Mr. Clerk attempted subsequently to supply. On the 4th of December, that is seventeen days after the first Regiment had moved across the Sutledge, he wrote to Capt.

Alexander, commanding the 2d Troop 2d Brigade of Horse Artillery, then on his way to Peshawar, requiring him on this emergency occasion, to anticipate the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief, and cross the Sutledge immediately. On the 7th, Mr. Clerk received orders from his Excellency prohibiting the dispatch of that troop of Horse Artillery, and he therefore cancelled the instructions which he had sent to Capt. Alexander. From the Blue Book it would appear that Mr. Clerk bore this bitter disappointment with exemplary resignation.

The despatch from the Governor General of the 2d December already alluded to, reached the Commander-in-Chief on the 12th. In it Lord Auckland had desired that the first Brigade should be made complete with a due proportion of artillery and cavalry. Sir Jasper, in his reply to this letter states, that the orders of the Governor General for the concentration of an effective brigade at Peshawar had been anticipated—but that neither artillery nor cavalry had been sent, because there was no probability of the want of the former; and it did not appear prudent to send on the 10th Cavalry. On the 20th the Governor General replied to this letter thanking His Excellency for the prompt and able manner in which the orders of Government had been executed; but regretting that more cavalry had not been sent—the number sent with the four Regiments was 100. It will be remembered that the Governor General on the 3d of December had written to the Commander-in-Chief to forbid the dispatch of a second Brigade. Sir Jasper's letter on the 12th, in acknowledging the receipt of it says, the injunction not to detach a second brigade, shall "be ever borne carefully in view—I shall with great reluctance order the advance of H. M. 9th and the 28th N. I. ... but very strong doubts are entertained as to whether the four native corps (already sent) can protect a considerable number through the Khyber." This letter from the Head of the army appears inexplicable, except upon the supposition that he disliked the war in Afghanistan, was anxious that the reverses we had experienced should induce Government to give up its hold on the country, and was altogether lukewarm about the dispatch of reinforcements. Such a supposition however we are not at liberty to entertain. At the object in sending forward the first four Regiments was to effect the relief of the beleaguered garrisons of Jellalabad and Cabul, if the Commander-in-Chief thought that they would be unable to accomplish this object, by protecting a large convoy through the Khyber, it might have been supposed that reinforcements would have been pushed on, not only without reluctance, but with cheerfulness.

At length, on the 4th of January, six weeks after the insurrection was known, the Queen's 9th and the Company's 29th, together with a Regiment of Cavalry, and Artillery were sent across the Sutledge—but the guns were sent without ammunition. Thus we find that the first four Regiments of relief were sent without guns—the last three with guns, and without ammunition. The Blue Book contains ample explanations of these deplorable omissions; but they were not the less culpable because an excuse was found for them. There is every reason to believe that if the first Brigade had started with a full equipment of Artillery and Cavalry, it would have reached Peshawar in the last week of December. Captain Mackeson affirms that the Khyber, though obstructed, was not at this time closed, as it subsequently was when our affairs appeared desperate; that a few dacoits would have opened a path for the troops; which might have been at Gundamuk by the 10th of January. The approach of such a force under the command of Sir Robert Sale could scarcely have failed to exercise a beneficial influence on the negotiations at Cabul; but even if it had not been in time to prevent the fatal retreat, it might have been instrumental in saving the lives of all those who perished at Jugdialuk and Gundamuk on the 12th and 13th January, among whom were included no less than forty-two officers. It is animating to speculate on the auspicious turn which affairs might have taken, if General Napier had commanded at Cabul; or, after the insurrection had become general, if Mr. George Clerk had been left to apply the resources of the state, unfettered, to the crisis which had arisen. In that case we should probably have had no Blue Book at all. We think the future historian of the campaign is likely to comment with little delicacy of language on the hesitation and reluctance with which these reinforcements were sent on. Neither will the narrow and inadequate view which was unhappily taken of the emergency at Head Quarters escape his observation; for when Brigadier Wild wrote on the 30th December from Peshawar, deeply regretting "that no Artillery had been allowed to accompany his force, and stating that if a troop of Horse Artillery had been present, he might have advanced immediately, the reply was that Jellalabad was considered to be in a state of security; and that affairs at Cabul had much improved by a supply of provisions having been obtained, and that there was no pressing necessity for an advance attended with heavy risk! To dwell so emphatically as the letters in the Blue Book do, on the heavy risk of succouring British troops, when exposed to almost certain destruction, is quite new in our military annals. But what will the future historian say to the extraordinary fact that the troops which left the banks of the Sutledge on the 17th November, did not reach Jellalabad before the 17th of April, four months after they had started!

On the 21st of January, Lord Auckland received information from Mr. Clerk that Sir W. Macnaghten had been assassinated by Akbar Khan; and a letter was addressed on the same day to the Commander-in-Chief by the Supreme Council, directing that a third Brigade should be held in readiness to move across the Punjab, and that it should comprise one European Regiment, a troop of Horse Artillery, and as large a body of Cavalry as could be spared. Within ten days after, intelligence reached Calcutta of the annihilation of the Cabul Army; and Government appears to have come immediately to the determination of withdrawing the troops from Jellalabad, and concentrating them at Peshawar. It was expected that General Pollock, with the 7000 men under his command, would be able to throw the Khyber, and win the siege of Jellalabad. The only immediate object left for General Pollock to accomplish, after the destruction of the Cabul force, was the reduction of that garrison. When this had been accomplished, it remained for Government to determine what ulterior measures should be adopted to recover our prisoners, and to vindicate our national honour. Lord Auckland expected to be relieved from his office within a month, and he appears to have deemed it prudent to leave the selection of those measures to his successor. It is true that the retirement from Jellalabad to Peshawar after General Sale's relief, which had been previously left optional with General Pollock, was now made peremptory; but this appears to have been dictated chiefly by military considerations, as Peshawar was supposed to be a much safer station for the troops; and it was manifestly Lord Auckland's intention to hold a strong position at that place, and to collect all the means and appliances necessary for another campaign, if such a step should have recommended itself to his successor. We can find no indication of his Lordship's determination to retire altogether—in fact—from the country. He speaks distinctly of preparing for any ulterior movement which might be thought proper by the Government here, or in England. Had the retirement on Peshawar been intended as a retirement within the Indus, Lord Auckland would scarcely have allowed the strong Brigade then marching across the Punjab, to have pursued its way. In the same letter to the Court of Directors, dated 16th February, in which these orders to General Pollock are recapitulated, Lord Auckland informs them that on the 10th of that month, he had issued instructions to General Nott in reference to his continuance at, or his withdrawal from Candahar, to act solely as might, to the best of his judgment, secure the paramount object of the safety of his troops, and uphold at the same time the honour of the British name. These directions correspond with the Notification issued by the Governor General on hearing of the annihilation of the Cabul force—that "the most active measures had been adopted, and would be steadily prosecuted for expediting powerful reinforcements to the Afghan frontier, and for assisting such operations as may be required in that quarter for the maintenance of the honour, and interests of the British Government." The letter to Sir James Nicolls of the 31st January after the disaster was known in Calcutta bears this construction. It says, "General Pollock will have a force of 12,000, a force which when assembled in concentrated strength, with due equipments and provisions, will be adequate to subdue all opposition to the movements it may be directed to undertake.... If General Pollock, arriving with only General Macnaghten's brigade, can safely maintain the position at Jellalabad, he will continue to do so; but rather than run any extreme risk in that position, the Governor General would wish the General to arrange for withdrawal from it and the assembling of all his forces at or near Peshawar." We have the same sentiments expressed again on the 10th February: "General Pollock should confine himself to withdrawing the Jellalabad Garrison to Peshawar and there for the present holding together all the troops in a secure position." In the last letter written during Lord Auckland's administration, the same intention appears to be predominant, that of withdrawing the garrison of Jellalabad to Peshawar, and then waiting the progress of events. At the same time the General was informed that the Governor General did not contemplate any great effort, in the present season, for the re-occupation of Afghanistan. The only passage which appears to disturb this impression of the views of Lord Auckland, is contained in a letter to Mr. Clerk of the 10th February and which runs thus: "If, at the same time, it should be your deliberate opinion that the important and vital interests of the British Government in India, and the well being of the British and Sikh states urgently require that the measure of withdrawing our troops from Peshawar, or at least farther eastward than some point on the left bank of the Indus should be suspended,"—which seems to intimate that some orders for retiring from Peshawar had been issued. But this view of the case has not only no support from any other portion of the documents; but is diametrically opposed to the tenor of all the other despatches. At the same time it is evident that Lord Auckland's first impulse on receiving news of the insurrection was to abandon Afghanistan; and that as our disasters multiplied his unwillingness to re-enter the country increased. We are ready to admit that we were not previously aware of the extent to which his anxiety for the withdrawal of our troops had been carried.

Having thus extracted from the Blue Book those passages which represent Lord Auckland's views of the measures proper for the existing crisis, we turn to those of his successor. Before we enter upon Lord Ellenborough's administration, we must acquit ourselves of an act of justice towards a public servant, who, belonging as he does to the same branch of the service with Clive, strongly relies on its remembrance the political genius of that eminent statesman. We allude of course to Mr. George Clerk. On hearing of the tragedy of Cabul, he proceeded in person to the Commander-in-Chief's Camp, and urged on him [No. 147] the necessity of holding our ground at Jellalabad against any Afghan power or force, with the view of retrieving our position at Cabul, by advancing upon it at its fit season, simultaneously from Candahar and Jellalabad. His advice that after having thus regained our position and the influence which such proof of power must give, not only in Afghanistan, but amongst all the neighbouring states, we should then withdraw with dignity and undiminished honour. His Excellency admitted the desirability of these arguments, but while we are greatly inclined to doubt that we have present either army or funds sufficient to recoup this contest. Money may perhaps be obtained; but soldiers are not, without leaving India here. Yet, after six months of indecision, the Government of India, followed precisely the path balked out by Mr. Clerk, and retired from Afghanistan with dignity and with augmented honour; and—strange to say,—troops were four for this expedition, without leaving India here. As soon as there was a hint to renew the contest, and re-establish our honour, it was discovered that there were quite troops enough for the undertaking.

The sentiments of Lord Ellenborough during the past year in reference to the war, belong to three distinct periods; and however his Lordship may suppose that they never underwent any variation, yet, to every other individual it may be evident that his measures at each of these successive periods exhibited, not a circumstantial variety but a substantial change of views. I divide three periods may be dated respectively from the 15th of March, the 10th of April, and the 4th of July. On the 15th of March Lord Ellenborough, in conjunction with the members of Council, thought it convenient to explain to Commander-in-Chief the deliberate views which were entertained respecting the measures to be pursued in Afghanistan, under the new administration which had then commenced. His Lordship fully adopted the views of his predecessor with regard to the continued possession of Afghanistan, which he felt would be a source of weakness rather than of strength; but in reference to the recovery of our prisoners and our reputation the despatch contains these remarkable expressions:— "Whatever course we may hereafter take, must rest solely on military considerations, and have, in the first instance, regard to the safety of the detached bodies of our troops at Jellalabad, at (thuzi), at Kalat-i-Ghilzie, and Candahar, to the security of our troops now in the field from all unnecessary risk, and finally to the re-establishment of our military reputation by the infliction of some signal and decisive blow upon the Afghans, which may make it appear to them, to our own subjects, and to our allies, that we have the power of inflicting punishment on those who commit atrocities, and violate their faith; and that we withdraw ultimately from Afghanistan, not from any deficiency of means to maintain our position, but because we are satisfied that the King we have set up, has not, as we were erroneously led to imagine, the support of the nation over which he has been placed." There has been no little discussion regarding the propriety of this advice, and some have gone so far as to attribute it to the Duke of Wellington, but a comparison of dates will show the impossibility of this conjecture. At the time it was written no letters had been received in India from London of a later date than the first week of January, at which time the Duke could scarcely have heard of the murder of Sir Alexander Burnes. The letter evidently embodies the sentiments of the Council, and the style affords the strongest evidence that it was composed by Mr. Maddock.

The Commander-in-Chief on receiving the letter of the 15th of March, immediately pointed out to the Governor General that General Pollock might be bewildered by the conflicting opinions of the Supreme Council, in as much as he had been instructed, on the 15th of February "to direct all his measures and efforts to the withdrawal of Sir R. Sale's force from Jellalabad to Peshawur, with the least possible delay," whereas in the letter of the 15th of March he was urged "to strike some signal and decisive blow upon the Afghans, with a view to the re-establishment of our military reputation," adding that by the ninth paragraph he would consider himself at liberty to choose the place and time at which such efforts were to be made, even to an advance on Cabul. He enquired of Lord Ellenborough which course the General was to follow. His Lordship replied, "not a day in replying," that the instructions contained in the letter from him in Council of the 15th March, necessarily superseded the previous instructions of the 15th February in every instance in which they might clash." Nothing therefore can be more evident than that up to the 12th April, the day on which this reply was written, Lord Ellenborough continued of opinion that the re-establishment of our military reputation in Afghanistan was an object of paramount importance.

But within a week a change came over Lord Ellenborough's feelings. He had now proceeded up the country. He had heard successively of the repulse of Col. Wild, and of the fall of Ghazni, and though on the 19th of April, the commencement of the second period, his Lordship had received intelligence that General

Pollock had forced the Khyber Pass, he had at the same time been informed of the check which General England had experienced at Hykulzie, and of his having subsequently fallen back on Quetta and fortified that post, under the impression that it was impossible for him to reach Candahar. The Governor General was evidently filled with deep consternation by this intelligence, and began to despair of eventual success. He wrote three successive letters to the Commander-in-Chief on the same day, the 19th April; the first to inform him that the fall of Ghazni had removed the chief object of General Nott's continued occupation of Candahar, and that the repulse which Brigadier England had experienced at Hykulzie, had induced him to order General Nott to abandon Candahar, and retire to the Indus, at the earliest practicable moment. The second letter threw out a hint that General Pollock having forced the Khyber, and probably recovered Sir Robert Sale, might also be ordered to fall back on Peshawur. In the third letter he expresses a doubt whether it would be justifiable again to push on General Pollock's force for no other object than that of avenging our losses, and of re-establishing in all its original brilliancy our military character. Sir Jasper was at the same time requested to give directions to General Pollock suitable to the new views which the Governor General had adopted; and Mr. Maddock was directed to write to General Nott ordering him to withdraw the garrison from Kelat-i-Ghilzie, to abandon Candahar and move down to the Indus. To this order General Nott replied on the 21st of May in terms of which the meaning could not be mistaken:—"I shall make all necessary arrangements for carrying into effect the orders I have received. . . . I know that it is my duty and their duty—that of the Political Agents—implicitly and zealously to carry into effect every order received, without enquiring into its reasons for the measures adopted, whatever our own opinions or wishes may be." The order to retire from Candahar, which was made peremptory, necessarily decided the question whether General Pollock should advance or not; because he could not have advanced on Cabul without General Nott's aid. We may therefore consider the 19th of April as the day on which his Lordship relinquished the idea of re-establishing in all its brilliancy our military character in Afghanistan, and resolved that both armies should retire within our own territories. This determination was adopted at a time when there was little hope of the liberation of our prisoners, and before Lord Ellenborough had heard of General Sale's victory at Jellalabad. On the 21st of April his Lordship received intelligence of that victory and issued the Notification which electrified India. On the 23d of April he wrote to the Court of Directors to announce the triumph of Jellalabad—and also sent copies of the instructions which he had issued to General Nott and General Pollock to retire to India at the earliest practicable period.

The three letters of the 19th appear to have reached the Commander-in-Chief on the 27th of April, and his Excellency stated in reply that he had not ventured to give any instructions to General Pollock; but that the orders of the 15th of March "must now guide him";—though they had been so completely superseded by the contrary orders of the 10th of April: The reason given for this rather anomalous proceeding was, "General Pollock was "a clear headed good officer." But His Excellency thought, better of the matter two days after, and resolved to embody the views of the Governor General in a letter from himself, in which he told the General that as Shah Sojah was dead, Ghuzni lost, and General Nott had been ordered to retire to the Indus, he was also to retire to Peshawur. He was directed not to wait for the prisoners, unless a negotiation for their release had been brought to such a point that his happy accomplishment might be risked by withdrawing—in other words, that if there was no treaty for their deliverance on the eve of being completed, they were to be left to their fate. "The hostages at Cabul," says His Excellency, "cannot, I think, be saved by any treaty or agreement made under existing circumstances at Jellalabad"—so you are not to loiter for them. The Governor General, on receiving the Commander-in-Chief's first letter, in which he had declined issuing any instructions to General Pollock, but preferred leaving that clear headed officer to interpret Lord Ellenborough's wishes of the 19th of April by his orders of the 15th of March, very wisely sat down to pen his own orders to General Pollock; and he informed him that the death of Shah Sojah, and the success which had attended our arms at Jellalabad and in the Khyber, rendered it more easy to withdraw the troops. "The first object of the Governor General's anxiety has ever been to withdraw," with honour, into positions of security the several corps of the army which he found scattered and surrounded in Afghanistan; and that object might now be accomplished as respected General Pollock's army."

When General Nott obtained intelligence of the determination made by Lord Auckland to withdraw General Pollock's force from Jellalabad to Peshawur, he wrote to Mr. Maddock on the 24th March deprecating this movement in the most emphatic language. His letter, No. 391, is one of the finest in the whole collection. Its style differs so essentially from the short and abrupt style of his subsequent dispatches, as to create a feeling of surprise that the same individual should adopt so different a mode of writing at different periods. Soon after the dispatch of this letter, General Nott heard that General England had been repulsed at Hykulzie, that he had retreated to Quetta, and had begun to fortify that position, apparently without the smallest intention of moving on to Candahar; and he wrote him that memorable letter of the 19th of April, which is unquestionably the most valuable of the collection, because upon it and on its results, turned the whole of our succeeding efforts, which have been crowned with such extraordinary success. We give it almost entire:

"I think it absolutely necessary that a strong brigade of 2,500 men should be immediately pushed from Quetta to Candahar, with the supplies noted in the foregoing paragraph. I, therefore, have to acquaint you, that I will direct a brigade of three regiments of Infantry, a troop of heavy artillery, with a body of cavalry, to march from Candahar on the morning of the 24th instant. This force will certainly be at Chusman, at the northern foot of the Kohjak, on the morning of the 1st of May, and possibly on the 30th of this month. I shall, therefore, fully rely on your marching a brigade from Quetta, so that it may reach the northern side of the pass on the above-mentioned date. I believe there can be no difficulty whatever in accomplishing this, now of crossing the Kohjak without loss, provided the heights are properly covered on either side. I have crossed it three times in command of troops, and I know that what I now state is correct. There can be no danger in passing through Pishawar, provided a careful and well-ordered march is preserved, and patrols and flanking-parties of horse are thrown well out. The people of this country cannot withstand our troops in the open field. I am well aware that war cannot be made without loss, but I yet hope that British troops can oppose Asiatic armies without defeat; and I feel and know that British officers should never despair of punishing the atrocious and treacherous conduct of a brutal enemy. You say that you are "not aware if you know the localities of Quetta." I know them well and I hope I shall be excused when I express my surprise that the authorities of Quetta should for a moment have thought of throwing up breastworks, and intrenching that straggling and wretched cantonment, when the town and citadel is so well calculated for every purpose which can render a post at all desirable in Shewar, and I am quite certain may be well defended by 800 men. Did I command at Quetta, I would relinquish the cantonment; it is useless. Quetta is not a place for a large body of troops. I feel obliged to you for pointing out the many difficulties attending our position, but you are well aware that it is our first and only duty to overcome difficulties, when the national honour and our military reputation are so deeply concerned. Nothing can be accomplished without effort and perseverance. In reply to the last paragraph of your letter of the 10th instant, I have only to observe, that I have not yet contemplated falling back; without money I can neither pay the long arrears due to the troops, nor procure carriages for field operations. I deeply regret this state of things, which ought to have been attended to months ago; had this been done, I should now have been on my march to Ghazni. I shall fully rely on your brigade being at the Kojuck on the 1st of May or before. This letter I request may be forwarded to Major Outram."

Well might the brave Major Outram on the perusal of this letter write to the Governor General's Private Secretary to say that it was "the most refreshing draft he had quaffed since our reverses commenced, as giving the best possible assurance that General Nott was equal to the powers vested in him." Had General England not advanced to Candahar, Lord Ellenborough could not have moved on to Cabul; and had not General Nott, in the exercise of that supreme political power which he had been invested, peremptorily ordered that officer to bring up his troops and his convoy to the Kojuck pass on a particular day, it is possible that General England might have continued in his entrenchments at Quetta till the whole of General Nott's force had fallen back on it. This letter is therefore the most important; as it is also the most animating which was written after our disasters had commenced. When it was laid before the Governor General, however, Mr. Maddock was directed to write to the General to say that his Lordship's views were unaltered, that he must retire upon the Indus, but that he might wait till October, as it seemed impossible for him to retire earlier. General Pollock having also represented the impossibility of his withdrawing at that time to Peshawar, was permitted to defer his retrograde movement till October. On the 14th May, the Governor General wrote to the Commander-in-Chief to say, that neither General Nott and Pollock could retire from Afghanistan before October; and that he had hitherto succeeded in preserving absolute secrecy with respect to his intentions of withdrawal; that he had done so by unusual means, but that it appeared to him essential to the public interests that entire secrecy on this point should be observed. But the Governor General was desirous as to his success in preserving absolute secrecy. An officer on Sir Jasper Nicolls's staff sent intelligence of the order to withdraw to Jallalabad; the officers betted at their mess, before the native servants, as to the probable date of the retrograde movement; and within a month it was known all over India, and commented on with appropriate indignation.

We have previously remarked that Lord Auckland's orders to retire, which were sent to General Pollock, restricted his withdrawal to Peshawar, where it was intended to concentrate a large force, to be prepared for those ulterior movements which his success, or the Ministry at home might direct. Lord Ellenborough's orders to retire are couched in general terms. The Generals are directed to place themselves in safe and easy communication with India. This might create a doubt whether his Lordship really intended to retire within our own territories, which must of course have been tantamount to the absolute abandonment of Afghanistan. But this doubt is removed, by the orders issued in one letter to General Nott to retire to Sukkur on the Indus, while those given to General Pollock are thus explained in the 46th paragraph of the very long letter which Lord Ellenborough wrote on the 6th of June to the Secret Committee at home: "On the 23d ultimo, the requisite instructions were issued for a despatch of ten lakhs of treasure to Major General Pollock to enable him to meet any difficulties in procuring carriage and supplies, in the present disorganised state of the Sikh army, in his rear; and in addressing the Commander-in-Chief on the subject I reiterated my earnest desire for the speedy return of General Pollock's army to the Sutledge. It appears that the withdrawal from Afghanistan, the intelligence of which the Governor General had endeavored hermetically to seal was intended to bring back the army at once to our own territories; and that the ten lakhs sent on were intended to purchase cattle for this retrograde movement to the Sutledge. The Commander-in-Chief's letter to General Pollock of the 28th May is also written under the impression that the troops were absolutely to retire to India; it alludes to the arrangements which had been made to render them more comfortable after they had crossed the Indus; and states that elephants and buffaloes would be assembled at Ferozapore."

On the 1st of June, Mr. Maddock wrote to General Pollock to express Lord Ellenborough's regret on learning that he could not retire immediately after having forced the Khyber, as it would have had the appearance of a military operation successfully accomplished and even triumphantly achieved, while the retirement of the army after six months of inaction would have a different and less advantageous character; but as he was compelled to remain till October, it was hoped he would be enabled to draw the enemy into a position in which he might strike a decisive blow. The General was also told that he has no political duties; that his business was in fact to do as much damage to the enemy as possible, and to come away as quickly as he could. That no doubt might be left on the mind that the Governor General's object was to withdraw General Pollock's army at the earliest possible moment to India, Mr. Maddock on the 5th of June wrote to Mr. Clerk, not only to collect cattle for the army, but to prepare boats of sufficient number and ample size for passing the rivers of the Punjab; and to make arrangements for provisioning the army in its progress through that country.

But all these views of retirement were suddenly changed on the memorable 4th of July, the commencement of the third period. General Pollock had been allowed for the convenience of his troops, to advance a portion of them a march or two towards Cabul. On the 4th of July Mr. Maddock was instructed to write to General Nott, to explain to him the reasons of this movement in advance lest he should be misled into the belief that it indicated any change in the main object of the instructions previously given him to retire. The Secretary was also instructed at the same time to write to General Pollock, to say that "no change had from the first taken place in the Governor General's views of the expediency of withdrawing his army at the earliest period consistent with the health and efficiency of the troops, that is, as now understood, in the beginning of October." The same post conveyed to both Generals orders diametrically opposed to the instructions contained in Mr. Maddock's letters. On that very day Lord Ellenborough himself wrote a letter to General Nott, to say that he had now for the first time reason to suppose that the General had the means of moving a large proportion of his army, and that the improved position of that army with sufficient means of carriage to move in Afghanistan induced his Lordship to leave to his option the line by which he should withdraw his troops. The letter proceeded to state that, in the direction of Quetta and Sukkur there would be no enemy to oppose him; but that in the other route there would be found difficulty, danger, and—glory. It recounted these remarkable expressions, which show how complete was the change which had come over the mind of Lord Ellenborough: "I do not undervalue the aid which our Government in India would receive from the successful execution by your army of a march through Ghuzni and Cabul, over the scenes of our late disasters. I know all the effect which it would have upon the minds of our soldiers, of our allies, of our enemies in Asia, and of our countrymen, and of all foreign nations in Europe. It is an object of just ambition, which no one more than myself would rejoice to see effected; but I see that failure in the attempt is certain and irretrievable ruin; and I would endeavour to inspire you with the necessary caution, and make you feel that great as are the objects to be attained by success, the risks are great also." His Lordship however does not seem to have entertained the smallest doubt of the course which General Nott would pursue, the moment his hands were loosed; and he proceeds to make arrangements under the impression that the General would inevitably choose to withdraw by way of Ghuzni and Cabul. Indeed from the moment the option to advance was given to General Nott, the Governor General evidently considered that advance as certain as though it had been peremptorily put in order; and he proceeded to say, "You will bring away with you from the tomb of Mahomed of Ghuzni, his clink which hangs over it, and you will bring away the gates of his tomb, which are the gates of the temple of Somnath. These will be the just trophies of your successful march.—You will not fail to disguise your intention of moving, and to acquaint General Pollock with your plans, as soon as you have formed them." "This letter," says the Governor General, "remains absolutely secret."—and Mr. Maddock himself, it seems, was allowed to know nothing of its having been despatched till this new order was echoed back from Candahar and Jellalabad. On the 23d of July, the Governor General wrote to General Pollock to say that he expected General Nott would be in possession of the letter of the 4th of that day; and that it was expected that he would exhibit himself sufficiently strong, and be sufficiently provided with carriage, to be able to march on Ghuzni and Cabul. His Lordship went on to say, "the object of the combined march of your army and General Nott's upon Cabul will be to exhibit our strength where we suffered defeat; to inflict just but not vindictive retribution upon the Affghans, and to recover the guns and colours as well as the prisoners lost by our army."

It appears, therefore, that this new resolution to march on Ghuzni and Cabul with a view to retrieve our honour to recover our guns and colours, and to release our prisoners was taken on the 4th of July. Lord Ellenborough, it is true, continued to affirm that no change had come over his views; and that he was only carrying out his original intentions. But if his Lordship succeeded in blinding his own eyes to the truth—of which we have some doubt,—he certainly blinded those of no one else. No man policy, in which honour and safety were to be so stupid as not to perceive the difference between General Nott's retiring upon Sukkur, in which direction there was no enemy, and his advancing to the reconquest of Ghuzni and Cabul. Every one else could feel that General Nott's inglorious retreat to the Indus was not the same thing as his triumphant advance to the Capital. Lord Ellenborough might consider that advancing was synonymous with retreating; but it only required a reference to the Dictionary to show that his Lordship was in the wrong. After all, it was a clumsy contrivance for getting out of the scrape into which the Governor General had fallen by the panic order of the 19th April; and it would certainly have been more beneficial to his reputation, to have avowed at once that circumstances had induced him to change his plans; and that instead of retreating without honour, he intended to restore our reputation in Central Asia before we withdrew from Afghanistan.

But what induced his Lordship to alter his determination, and to "retire by way of Ghuzni and Cabul?" The letter of the 4th July would lead one to suppose that it was occasioned solely by the announcement, that the 3000 camels which he had ordered for the retreat had safely reached Candahar. It is but justice to his Lordship to remove the suspicion that so weighty and important a measure did not originate in so inadequate a cause. The real reason creeps out accidentally in the letter sent to the Court of Directors on the 16th August, which announces this change of views in language marked by extreme caution. This letter to the Court, written six weeks after the option had been given to General Nott to advance on Ghuzni, and afterwards had been ordered to bring away the guns and the guns, appears to have been the first intimation given to the Directors of this important movement. The third paragraph runs in the usual strain: "I adhere to my original intention of withdrawing the whole army from Afghanistan, and I have repeated in the most emphatic manner the order before given for the withdrawal." The next paragraph announces the decision in the same strain: "Some risk I deem it justifiable to incur for the recovery of the guns and of the prisoners and with the view of exhibiting the triumphant march of a British army over the ground on which we have suffered defeat"—but "I should never forgive myself if I exposed that army to any material and serious danger, for the possible accomplishment of any object now to be obtained in Afghanistan." Then comes the cause of the movement: "my hope and expectations are that, without incurring such danger, I shall effect, through the instructions I have given, every object now desired by the people of England." It must not be forgotten that the full details of the Cabul Tragedy reached England in the beginning of April; and that the papers of that month, which described the ardor of the people of England for the recovery of our national reputation, reached Lord Ellenborough towards the end of June. The dispatches which he received from the Ministry doubtless breathed the same spirit. The sentiments of the community in India were unanimous for an advance. The order to withdraw had no support but in the columns of the Bombay Times, and the Harkara; and his Lordship wisely embraced the first decent opportunity—and it was afforded by the intelligence that three thousand camels had reached Candahar—to cancel that offensive order, and to revert to the only line of policy, in which honour and safety were to be found.

After Lord Ellenborough had recovered his spirits and his resolution, and determined to re-establish our national reputation on the scenes in which it had suffered an eclipse, his letters and actions exhibit the utmost vigor. Thus in writing to General Pollock,—before he had learned that General Nott had resolved to advance—he says, "It appears to me far better, and more honourable to our arms that this movement on Cabul should be continued, than that even on the actual delivery of the guns, colours, trophies, and prisoners, it should be countermanded." In writing to the Court of Directors on the 17th of August, he says, "I have told the Major General, that when every gun and colour and Military trophy in the hands of the Affghans, and every prisoner within the reach and power of the de facto Government of Cabul have been surrendered to him, and not till then, he may give orders suited to a state of returning peace." The most arduous efforts were made to send cattle to General Pollock's Army. It is true that they arrived at Jellalabad after the General had proceeded with his Army to Cabul, and were therefore of no service in furthering his advance. It is quite true that the sixteen thousand head of cattle, the mention of which by Sir Robert Peel caused forth such deafening cheers in the House of Commons, assisted the army only on its return; but after the 4th of July, there was no lukewarmness, no hesitation, no pusillanimity. The Governor General had passed from the extreme of despondency to the extreme of enthusiasm; and did all in his power by ten weeks of activity to repair the mischief occasioned by ten weeks of inaction. Notwithstanding the vote of the House of Commons, however, it is a fact that the success of that brilliant expedition which re-established our supremacy in Asia, was owing to the exertions made under Lord Auckland's administration, and that no addition was made to the means of action under the reign of his successor, save in the three thousand camels which General Pollock was able to purchase for his retreat. It will be readily admitted that there appears a degree of faint heartiness in the despatches of Lord Auckland after he had been stung by the news of the outbreak, and that the troops sent on under Generals Pollock and England were designed to prevent additional disasters rather than to retrieve our lost honour. There is evidently more to be known of the resolutions taken in Calcutta at that period than the Blue Book discloses. While the Governor General continues with his Council, his measures are in some measure controlled or modified by the opinions of his colleagues; and we have yet to learn what portion of the credit of Lord Auckland's dispatches, and of the letter of Lord Ellenborough on the 15th of March, is due to the magnanimity and firmness of the other members of the Supreme Council. But, as far as we are admitted into the secrets of the year by the Blue Book it appears that the credit of having applied the resources of the British empire successfully to the recovery of our national reputation, belongs with more truth to the period of Lord Auckland's than of Lord Ellenborough's administration. At the most important period of the year, from the 19th of April to the 4th July, Lord Ellenborough did nothing,—and worse than nothing. Admitting that the repulse of General England, coming so thick upon the intelligence that the advance of our troops had been blocked in the Khyber, and that Ghuzni had fallen, created a panic in his mind, under the influence of which he thought the salvation of India depended on our getting out of the country; yet when his Lordship was informed in the last week of May, that General England had safely reached Candahar and that General Nott's force was now equipped for any service, the order to advance ought not to have been delayed for a moment; and it is much to be questioned whether the deliberate, and not accidental, loss of those golden weeks, is not deserving of more censure than the subsequent exertions, in sending out, which met the General on their return, are deserving of praise.

We have many apologies to offer our readers for the extraordinary length to which this article has extended; but we trust that the importance of presenting an uninterrupted review of the Blue Book, combined with the great interest of the subject, will plead some excuse for our having devoted this number almost exclusively to it.

MEETINGS IN HONOUR OF THE LATE SIR WILKIN MACGAGHERY.—The report of the meeting convened last Tuesday week in honour of the late Sir W. Macgagherey reached us too late to admit of more than a brief notice of its proceedings. We were not a little disappointed at the report. In the first place it was opened by the Chairman with only "a few words," instead of an animating address, which would have given the tone to the meeting. We have learned incidentally that another gentleman had been selected to preside on the occasion, from whom an appropriate introduction was expected, and that he was prevented from attending by another engagement. The Rev. Mr. Fishburn was then called to the chair, but as he was not prepared for the duties thus unexpectedly cast upon him, his address was necessarily brief and meagre. In the next place, only a single address was delivered on the occasion, though the meeting was attended by many of Sir Macgagherey's friends and admirers of the deceased, who were fully competent to describe the excellencies of his private character and the talent displayed in his public conduct. In the third place, the address of Mr. Rattway, though highly appropriate and

I know that what I now state is correct. There can be no danger in passing through Fikson, provided a careful and well-ordered march is pursued, and parties and flankings-parties of horse are thrown well out. The people of this country cannot withstand our troops in the open field. I am well aware that war cannot be made without loss, but I yet hope that British troops can oppose Asiatic armies without defeat; and I feel and know that British officers should never despair of punishing the atrocious and treacherous conduct of a brutal enemy. You say that you are "not aware if you know the location of Quetta." I know them well and I hope I shall be crowned when I express my surprise that the authorities of Quetta should for a moment have thought of throwing up breastworks, and intrenching that struggling and wretched settlement, when the town and citadel is so well calculated for every purpose which can render a post at all desirable in Shawl, and I am quite certain may be well defended by 500 men. Did I command at Quetta, I would relinquish the settlement; it is useless. Quetta is not a place for a large body of troops. I feel obliged to you for pointing out the many difficulties attending our position, but you are well aware that it is our first and only duty to overcome difficulties, when the national honour and our military reputation are so deeply concerned. Nothing can be accomplished without effort and perseverance. In reply to the last paragraph of your letter of the 10th instant, I have only to observe, that I have not yet contemplated sailing back; without money I can neither pay the long arrears due to the troops, nor procure carriage for field operations. I deeply regret this state of things, which ought to have been attended to months ago; had this been done, I should now have been on my march to Ghuzni. I shall fully rely on your brigade being at the Kojuck on the 1st of May or before. This letter I request may be forwarded to Major Outram."

Well might the brave Major Outram on the perusal of this letter write to the Governor General's Private Secretary to say that it was "the most refreshing draft he had quaffed since our reverses commenced, as giving the best possible assurance that General Nott was equal to the powers vested in him." Had General England not advanced to Candahar, Lord Ellenborough could not have moved on to Cabul; and had not General Nott, in the exercise of that supreme political power with which he had been invested, peremptorily ordered that officer to bring up his troops and his convoy to the Kojuck pass on a particular day, it is possible that General England might have continued in his entrenchments at Quetta till the whole of General Nott's force had fallen back on it. This letter is therefore the most important, as it is also the most animating which was written after our disasters had commenced. When it was laid before the Governor General, however, Mr. Maddock was directed to write to the General to say that his Lordship's views were mistaken, that he must retire upon the Indus, but that he might wait till October, as it seemed impossible for him to retire earlier. General Pollock having also represented the impossibility of his withdrawing at that time to Peshawar, was permitted to defer his retrograde movement till October. On the 14th May, the Governor General wrote to the Commander-in-Chief to say, that neither Generals Nott and Pollock could retire from Afghanistan before October; and that he had hitherto succeeded in "providing absolute security with respect to his intentions of withdrawing, that he had done so by unusual means, but that it appeared to him essential to the public interests that entire secrecy on this point should be observed." But the Governor General was desirous as to his success in preserving absolute secrecy. An officer on Sir Jasper Nicolls's staff sent intelligence of the order to withdraw to Jellalabad; the officers bated at their news, before the native servants, as to the probable date of the retrograde movement, and within a month it was known all over India, and commented on with appropriate indignation.

We have previously remarked that Lord Auckland's orders to retire, which were sent to General Pollock, restricted his withdrawal to Peshawar, where it was intended to concentrate a large force, to be prepared for those ulterior movements which his successor, or the Ministry at home might direct. Lord Ellenborough's orders to retire are couched in general terms. The Generals are directed to place themselves in safe and easy communication with India. This might create a doubt whether his Lordship really intended to retire within our own territories, which must of course have been tantamount to the absolute abandonment of Afghanistan. But this doubt is removed, by the orders issued in one letter to General Nott to retire to Sukkur on the Indus, while those given to General Pollock are thus explained in the 69th paragraph of the very long letter which Lord Ellenborough wrote on the 8th of June to the Secret Committee at home: "On the 28d ultimus, the requisite instructions were issued for a despatch of ten lakhs of treasure to Major General Pollock to enable him to meet any difficulties in procuring carriage and supplies, in the present disorganized state of the Sikh army, in his rear; and in addressing the Commander-in-Chief on the subject I reiterated my earnest desire for the speedy return of General Pollock's army to the Sulagee. It appears that the withdrawal from Afghanistan, the intelligence of which the Governor General had endeavored hermetically to seal was intended to bring back the army at once to our own territories; and that the ten lakhs sent on were intended to purchase cattle for this retrograde movement to the Sulagee. The Commander-in-Chief's letter to General Pollock of the 28th May is also written under the impression that the troops were absolutely to retire to India; it alludes to the arrangements which had been made to render them more comfortable after they had crossed the Indus; and states that elephants and buffaloes would be assembled at Ferozapore."

On the 1st of June, Mr. Maddock wrote to General Pollock to express Lord Ellenborough's regret on learning that he could not retire immediately after having forced the Khyber, as it would have had the appearance of a military operation successfully accomplished, and even triumphantly achieved, while the retirement of the army after six months of inaction would have a different and less advantageous character; but as he was compelled to remain till October, it was hoped he would be enabled to draw the enemy into a position in which he might strike a decisive blow. The General was also told that he has no political duties; that his business was in fact to do as much damage to the enemy as possible, and to come away as quickly as he could. That no doubt might be left on the mind that the Governor General's object was to withdraw General Pollock's army at the earliest practicable moment to India, Mr. Maddock on the 4th of June wrote to Mr. Clerk, not only to collect cattle for the army, but to prepare boats of sufficient number and ample size for passing the river of the Punjab; and to make arrangements for provisioning the army in its progress through that country.

But all these views of retirement were suddenly changed on the memorable 4th of July, the commencement of the third period. General Pollock had been allowed for the convenience of his troops, to advance a portion of them a march or two towards Cabul. On the 4th of July Mr. Maddock was instructed to write to General Nott, to explain to him the reason of this movement in advance lest he should be misled into the belief that it indicated any change in the main object of the instructions previously given him to retire. The Secretary was also instructed at the same time to write to General Pollock, to say that "no change had from the first taken place in the Governor General's views of the expediency of withdrawing his army at the earliest period consistent with the health and efficiency of the troops, that is, as now understood, in the beginning of October." The same post conveyed to both Generals orders diametrically opposed to the instructions contained in Mr. Maddock's letters. On that very day Lord Ellenborough himself wrote a letter to General Nott, to say that he had now for the first time reason to suppose that the General had the means of moving a large proportion of his army, and that the improved position of that army with sufficient means of carriage to move in Afghanistan induced his Lordship to leave to his option the line by which he should withdraw his troops. The letter proceeded to state that, in the direction of Quetta and Sukkur there would be no enemy to oppose him; but that in the other route there would be found difficulty, danger, and glory. It contained these remarkable expressions, which show how complete was the change which had come over the mind of Lord Ellenborough: "I do not undervalue the aid which our Government in India would receive from the successful execution by your army of a march through Ghuzni and Cabul, over the scenes of our late disasters. I know all the effect which it would have upon the minds of our soldiers, of our allies, of our enemies in Asia, and of our countrymen, and of all foreign nations in Europe. It is an object of just ambition, which no one more than myself would rejoice to see effected; but I see that failure in the attempt is certain and irretrievable ruin; and I would endeavour to inspire you with the necessary caution, and make you feel that great as are the objects to be attained by success, the risks are great also." His Lordship however does not seem to have entertained the smallest doubt of the course which General Nott would pursue, (the moment his hands were loosed) and he proceeds to make arrangements under the impression that the General would invariably choose to "withdraw by way of Ghuzni and Cabul." Indeed from the moment the option to advance was given to General Nott, the Governor General evidently considered that advance as certain as though it had been peremptorily put in orders; and he proceeded to say, "You will bring away with you from the tomb of Mahomed of Ghuzni, his club which hangs over it, and you will bring away the gates of his tomb, which are the gates of the temple of Somnath. These will be the just trophies of your successful march.—You will not fail to disguise your intention of moving, and to acquaint General Pollock with your plans, as soon as you have formed them." "This letter," says the Governor General, "remains absolutely secret;"—and Mr. Maddock himself, it seems, was allowed to know nothing of its having been despatched sound on which we have suffered defeat"—but till this new order was echoed back from Candahar and Jellalabad. On the 29d of July the Governor (General) wrote to General Pollock to say that he expected General Nott's possession of the letter of the 4th on that day; and that it was expected that he would feel himself sufficiently strong, and be sufficiently fortified with carriage, to be able to march on Ghazni and Cabul. His Lordship went on to say, "the object of the combined march of your army and General Nott's upon Cabul will be to exhibit our strength where we suffered defeat; to inflict just but not vindictive retribution upon the Afghans, and to recover the guns and colours as well as the prisoners lost by our army."

It appears, therefore, that this new resolution to march on Ghuzni and Cabul with a view to restore our honour to recover our guns and colours, and to release our prisoners was taken on the 4th of July. Lord Ellenborough, it is true, continued to affirm that no change had come over his views; and that he was only carrying out his original intentions. But if his Lordship succeeded in blinding his own eyes to the truth—of which we have some doubt,—he certainly blinded those of no one else. No man was so stupid as not to perceive the difference between General Nott's retreating upon Bukkur, in which direction there was no enemy, and his advancing to the reconquest of Ghuzni and Cabul. Every one else could feel that General Nott's inglorious retreat to the Indus was not the same thing as his triumphant advance to the Capital. Lord Ellenborough might consider that advancing was synonymous with retreating, but it only required a reference to the Dictionary to show that his Lordship was in the wrong. After all, it was a clumsy contrivance for getting out of the scrape into which the Governor General had fallen by the panic order of the 10th April; and it would certainly have been more beneficial to his reputation, to have avowed at once that circumstances had induced him to change his plan; and that instead of retreating without honour, he intended to restore our reputation in Central Asia, before we withdrew from Afghanistan.

be the outbreak, and that the troops sent under Generals Pollock and England were directed to prevent additional disasters rather than to retrieve our lost honour. There is evidently more to be known of the resolutions taken in Calcutta at that period than the Blue Book discloses. While the Governor General continues with his Council, his measures are in some measure controlled or modified by the opinions of his colleagues; and we have yet to learn what portion of the credit of Lord Auckland's despatches, and of the letter of Lord Ellenborough on the 15th of March, is due to the magnanimity and firmness of the other members of the Supreme Council. But, as far as we are admitted into the secrets of the year by the Blue Book it appears that the credit of having applied the resources of the British empire successfully to the recovery of our national reputation, belongs with more truth to the period of Lord Auckland's than of Lord Ellenborough's administration. At the most important period of the year, from the 19th of April to the 4th July, Lord Ellenborough did nothing,—and worse than nothing. Admitting that the repulse of General England, coming so thick upon the intelligence that the advances of our troops had been checked in the Khyber, and that Ghazal had fallen, created a panic in his mind, under the influence of which he thought the salvation of India depended on our getting out of the country; yet when his Lordship was informed in the last week of May, that General England had safely reached Candahar and that General Nott's force was now equipped for any service, the order to advance ought not to have been delayed for a moment; and it is much to be questioned whether the deliberate, and not accidental, loss of those golden weeks, is not deserving of more censure than the subsequent exertions, in sending cattle, which met the General on their return, are deserving of praise.

But what induced his Lordship to alter his determination, and to "wring by Ghuzni and Cabul?" The letter of the 4th July would lead one to suppose that it was connected solely by the announcement, that the 30000 camels which he had ordered for the retreat had safely reached Candahar. It is but justice to his Lordship to remove the suspicion that so weighty and important a measure did not originate in so inadequate a cause. The real reason creeps out accidentally in the letter sent to the Court of Directors on the 18th August, which announces this change of views in language marked by extreme caution. This letter to the Court, written eleven weeks after the option had been given, General Scott to advance on Ghuzni, and after he had been ordered to bring away the dubs and the guns, appears to have been the first intimation given to the Directors of this important movement. The third paragraph runs in the following strain: "I adhere to my original intention of withdrawing the whole army from Afghanistan, and I have repeated in the most emphatic manner the order before given for withdrawal." The next paragraph announces the change: "Some risk I deem it justifiable to incur for the recovery of the guns and of the prisoners and with the view of exhibiting the triumphant march of a British army over the

MEETING IN HONOR OF THE LATE SIR WILLIAM MACNAGHTEN.—The report of the meeting convened last Tuesday week in honor of the late Sir W. Macnaghten reached us too late to admit of more than a brief notice of its proceedings. We were not a little disappointed at the report. In the first place it was opened by the chairman with only "a few words," instead of an animating address, which would have given the tone to the meeting. We have learned incidentally that another gentleman had been selected to preside on the occasion, from whom an appropriate introduction was expected, and that he was prevented from attending by another engagement. The Rev. Mr. Fisher was then called to the chair, but as he was not prepared for the duties thus unexpectedly cast on him, his address was necessarily brief and meagre. In the next place, only a single address was delivered on the occasion, though the meeting was attended by many of his friends and admirers of the deceased, who were fully competent to describe the excellencies of his private character and the talent displayed in his public conduct. In the third place, the address of Mr. Batty, though highly commendable, was as it stood, was confined to a small portion of his official career. It shines not over caution, on an occasion on which, if at any time, the wisest action would have been justified. If it had been intended to convene a meeting only of Sir William's personal friends, to mark their attachment to his memory by the erection of a suitable monument, the proceedings as reported would have been quite in character; but as it was a meeting not only of his own friends but also of the community in general, and was intended to commemorate both his private worth and his public exertions, it would have been almost inadvisable to the occasion to have dwelt with spirit and energy on his claims to a public memorial, founded on the evidence of his official services which had been rewarded by one of the highest offices in the gift of the public Authorities.

It has been suggested that any such allusion to that part of his public career, in which he stood forward more prominently before the world both in India and Europe, would have destroyed the unanimity as desirable on every such occasion, in as much as he was identified with the Afghan war, of the justice of which some who were present entertained great doubts. But it would not have been difficult to have separated his individual merits when placed in a situation of high trust from the political question of the war, as to have dwelt on the talent he exhibited amidst unexampled difficulties, without falling into any approbation of the policy by which Lord Auckland's administration has been rendered memorable. The clouds which hung over his character while we were but partially informed of the course of events at Cabul, have been gradually dispelled; and though he may have been to blame for having allowed himself to be lulled into security while Afghan treachery was preparing for our destruction, yet every successive account we receive from eye witnesses, places his conduct after the crisis had arrived in the most favorable light. Indeed there is every reason to believe that if he had enjoyed the post of General instead of that of Envoy at Cabul, the final catastrophe might have been averted.

CANAL VERSUS THE RAILWAY.—We had the pleasure last week of publishing a letter relative to the construction of a Canal, instead of a Railway to Allahabad; and we regret that owing to an unfortunate mistake in the office, the estimate which should have accompanied it, was omitted.

We discovered the omission after the sheet had gone to press, too late to remedy it. We have now the pleasure of annexing the calculations to this article. They will enable our scientific friends to report, and with greater advantage, the letter which we published last week and to test the calculations of the writer. He is already being employed by the house of Carr, Ferguson and Co. in surveying the line of country from the Colliery to the Hooghly, in order to ascertain the feasibility of uniting them by means of a canal. His survey has been conducted with great scientific accuracy; and his map of the country to be traversed will be found of eminent service even though the scheme itself should not be carried into execution. It may reasonably be questioned, however, that the expense of a canal to the Burdwan coal mines could be profitably incurred in our present ignorance of the mineral resources of this excellent country. The chief utility of such a canal at this locality would be the cheaper and easy transportation of coal to the metropolis. But it may happen that, after the canal shall have been completed, coal of a superior quality will be discovered in other districts, in positions so favorable for transport to Calcutta as materially to diminish the importance of the Burdwan collieries.

A Canal to Allahabad however will be liable to no such fluctuation of value. It will connect towns and marts, which have every prospect of enjoying a long lease of extension. The commercial interests to which it would become subservient have at present every appearance of being permanent. There can be no question, that for the transit of merchandise a canal would be cheaper than a rail, and on that consideration more feasible; but speed of transmission must be taken into the account in every undertaking which claims patronage in the present age; and here the canal would labor under a great disadvantage. Nor must it be forgotten that no enterprise, whether it be the canal projected by our correspondent, or the rail roads of the Engineer office can be carried into effect without the co-operation of Government. Funds might doubtless be raised in England to the extent of Eighty-three lakhs of Rupees for a canal; but capitalists have no confidence in private individuals here though united as a corporation, and will not entrust their funds to them. It is said that the crodis of Calcutta has sunk so low that even the merchants of New South Wales affect to mistrust us. Unless there fore such an enterprise was placed under the safeguard of the public authorities, it would not meet with adequate support. But if Government were to undertake the patronage, and aid in the accomplishment of any such undertaking, it would naturally select one which would be equally advantageous in a political and a military as in a commercial point of view, and would give the preference to the railway, notwithstanding the expense. After half a dozen years of peace, the finances of India would easily bear the annual demand for a rail road; and it would have the superior recommendation of conveying passengers as well as goods, and both with the greatest rapidity; it would enable Government on an emergency to push forward a whole brigade of troops, and to transport military stores with ease and speed, and thus to crush opposition in the bud. The advantage of a railway over a canal to the public interests would be greater than the advantage of a canal over a railway in point of economy.

We hope the papers with which our correspondent has favoured us will draw forth such observations from our scientific readers as may serve to keep up the discussion, and advance the cause of public improvement.

THE NEW CHURCH AT COLARA.—The reader scarcely needs to be informed that a proposal was made some time ago at Bombay to erect a Monument to the memory of the brave men who fell in Afghanistan. It was originally intended to carry this design into effect by building a cenotaph, or a mausoleum, or monumental column; but a number of the friends of religion, were enabled at one of the meetings to overrule this design, and to substitute for it the erection of a Church at Colaba. The Bishop of Calcutta happening to be at Bombay at the time, gave his verdict for the Church, and subscribed 1000 Rupees towards it. The action of the original movement however resolved to adhere to their first intentions, and have been endeavouring to obtain subscriptions for a cenotaph. We have received a copy of the prospectus for the Church, which will be found among our advertisements and have been solicited to advocate its claims to public support. We feel some degree of delicacy on the subject, and would rather decline any interference in a discussion which does not belong to us, and in which we can do no good. A cenotaph to commemorate departed excellence is certainly more in unison with the feelings and practice of this age, and will probably obtain more support from military men. At the same time the erection of a Church at a place where it is needed is an object that must commend itself to every right mind. If on such an occasion, one may be supposed to enjoy two votes, we would rather split them between the Church and the Cenotaph, than give a plumper to the Church.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 4.

— There was a meeting of the Landholder's Society held on Monday evening, the 1st May. The most activity still continues to pervade the Society. There are no less than seven subjects now upon the tapis. Relative to the Draft of an Act for the employment of Assistant Magistrates, it was resolved to forward a letter to Government expressing the satisfaction and gratitude with which the Draft had been listened to by the Committee, and praying that after the words, Natives of India, should be inserted the words, and all other persons.

— Some anonymous correspondent of the Day informs in the number of this morning in putting the summary in Calcutta, states that a very great number of Protestant parents have, at the hazard of their children's religion, sent their girls to it. We always understood the Catholic priesthood to assert that the subject of religion was not mooted at the Loreto House, and that Protestant children might be sent there with perfect impunity. We now learn from one who seems to be in the secret, that Protestant children do hazard their faith by being sent there.

— Yesterday's Calcutta Gazette announces that Dr. Meant has been appointed Secretary to the Council of Education. He already sustains the office of Secretary and Treasurer of the Medical College, and Professor of Chemistry and Materia Medica. He must therefore have his hands tolerably full; and though we believe he will do all he can in this new department of labour, and can do more than many other men, yet the appointment of any individual with other heavy engagements as Secretary in the department of Education shows the very high estimation in which it is held. Government would not thus dispose of the office of Secretary to the Revenue or the Salt and Opium Board.

— Mr. Dampier, the Superintendent of Police, has written to Mr. Patton, the Magistrate of Calcutta, to advise that parties proceeding in charge of goods by land by the trunk and should be immediately to halt by night at places where there are police posts, as the police with the chaurmahars, or men in shape, would be able to resist attacks on the property made by parties from Shahabul, who are always on the watch for opportunities of plunder.

— Last night's Calcutta Gazette announces the appointment of Mr. Frederick James Halliday, as Secretary to the Government of Bengal. But as he was appointed to this office so far back as the 23rd May, 1893, and has never been removed from it, it seems difficult to account for a second appointment to the same office. The oracle of the Gazette goes no farther, and leaves us to solve the riddle, as best we may. The Herkara however, fifty men, five women and four children. Nineteen is in a little light on the subject by giving us to understand that the Gazette in saying that Mr. Halliday was to be Secretary to the Government of Bengal, meant that he was to be Secretary to the Government of India.

FRIDAY, MAY 5.

— We have papers from China to the 25th of March; their contents are not of particular interest. Mr. Col. Malcolm had arrived in the Pine, with the ratification of the Treaty by Mr. Majesty. The Plenipotentiary having declared his intention of going to the Northward to expel the settlements of the commercial treaty, a Mandarin of rank waited on him to represent that this would probably result matters, and to entreat him to reside at Hong Kong, as the new Commissioner, Mr. Ryming, might shortly be expected at Canton, immediately after which the ratifications will be mutually exchanged. To this request Mr. Majesty Pottinger has assented. The Chinese Government will send out several cruisers with the view of putting down the pirates; but they have strictly declined the co-operation of the British authorities.

— The Delli Gazette states, that the Governor-General has conceded to the King of Delli the point of Nuzurana, or the presenting of a present, or Nuzur annually to him on the part of the British Government. Our contemporary affirms that it is to be paid in addition to the usual allowances, and that the King is offended with this arrangement and resolves to appeal from it; but what cause of offence there can be in making these additional presents, we are at a loss to conceive.

— A representation has evidently been made to the Court of Lahore to prevent any of the Amcers of Sindh taking refuge in its dominions, as we now learn that very stringent orders have been given to the Governor of Multan, to give them no asylum.

— The Hindostan Steamer reached Madras in less than four days, that is in 96 hours, against a strong current and wind. One of the passengers has written a letter to the Englishman, describing the situation of the passengers on board as every thing that could be desired—only the cabins are wretchedly small, and altogether suffocating. Every one seems to keep out of them as much and as long as he can, and many wisely prefer sleeping on the deck to entering the oven. This is the first voyage of the Hindostan in the month of April, and experience teaches that the arrangements which are admirably adapted for a cold climate will not do for India in the hot weather. The writer was allude to, says that it seems no longer a matter of doubt that the Steamer cannot get to sea under three days from leaving Mr. Engle's house. Surely this might be rectified. It would be strange if the vessel was within sixteen hours as long going from Garden Reach to the Sand Heads as from the Sand Heads to Madras.

— The Medal which the Court of Directors have bestowed on Dwaraknath Tagore, has arrived in India; and will be presented to him by the Deputy Governor on Wednesday next, when the company of ladies and gentlemen is solicited. We hope the Chukruttee fiction and the Tagore family who turned Dwaraknath out of society will be there to witness the ceremony.

— The fort of Khyral has been a scene of confusion and plunder since it fell into our hands. The Sappers and Miners have been diligently employed in knocking down places suspected of containing treasure and stores. By the 10th, treasure had been found to the extent of three lakhs and a half; but private plunder had been carried to a great extent notwithstanding the efforts of the public Authorities.

SATURDAY, MAY 6.

— The Indian Atlas publishes a letter from Bellary, which gives a fearful account of the mortality in H. M.'s 63d. The Regiment has lost 100 men in one day.

— The Agre Ushar states that ground has been marked out for the offices of the Sudder Court and Sudder Board, at that station, to which they will probably be removed from Allahabad in the next cold season.

— The intelligence from Sindh received through the Bombay reports is that the Queen's 23d had been removed from Hyderabad to Karachi; that the country was quiet and tranquil; the two victories having extinguished opposition. The troops who occupied Hyderabad were still employed in searching for concealed treasure, considerable quantities of which turned up every day, but none had been sent on to Bombay. The doors of the Scannas were thrown open by order of Lord Elphinstone and the inmates were told that they were at liberty to retire wherever they would. Only thirty out of a hundred chose to exit in their last wish, their former masters and determined to follow them to Bombay. The rest availed themselves of the freedom they had obtained.

— The fallen Amers of Sindh have been received in Dushar by the Governor of Bombay, who has treated them with the greatest kindness and consideration. His attention and kindness appear to be only appreciated by them. Their future destination is at yet unknown; they will not however be allowed to return to Sindh, or be placed in a situation so near to it as to afford any facilities for intrigue. While at the seat of Government every thing calculated to alienate their services will be allowed them.

— Mr. Cochrane, formerly of the Calcutta bar, who afterwards proceeded to Bombay and practiced there with much success, is about to return to Calcutta. In an appeal case lately heard before the Privy Council, he appeared for one of the parties and was highly complimented by Lord Brougham for the extraordinary ability of his argument. Should Mr. Cochrane and Mr. Dickinson return to the bar of Calcutta, its profits will be divided among a greater number of barristers than at any period since its establishment.

SUNDAY, MAY 8.

— At the last meeting of the Asiatic Society a little box containing a portion of the dust of the annual vool game was presented and examined by the members. We believe the impression was general that the game was really of sandal wood. The exhibition of the little box occasioned no small amusement. A copy of the inscription as well as a drawing of the game, and the report of the Engineer officers, was by some accident not presented at the same time with the dust.

— The Madras Atlas, brought up by the India states that intelligence to the 6th of March had been received through that steamer, and that McLaughlin had been acquitted on the ground of insanity. He is indebted in a great measure for his acquittal to the exertions of Mr. Cochrane, formerly of the Calcutta bar, and who is about shortly to return to it.

— The Bombay papers just received state that the place selected by the Governor of Bombay for the residence of the Amers of Sindh, is the most eligible situation that could have been chosen. It is the old palace formerly given by Sir John Malcolm to the new dethroned or exiled East India Amulation Society.

— By the intelligence from Sukker which is given in the last number of the Delli Gazette we learn that Sindh can scarcely as yet be said to be tranquillized. There does not appear to be any regular post by land between Hyderabad and Sukker, which is owing probably to the road being infected by the Belodooes who have always shown a great partiality for our mails. The mails are brought up at long intervals by the Steamers. Capt. Tucker and Col. Pattle were proceeding to Surpore on a sick certificate.

— The draft of a new Act has just appeared in the Calcutta Gazette, which directs that the Judges, Europeans and Native shall record their decrees in their own vernacular tongue, after which they are to be translated into the language in use in the Court. This Act, will at once get rid of the very objectionable practice which was said to prevail in some Courts, and may yet linger in them, of deceiving or dismissing a cause, and then leaving the Ministerial to draw up to discover the reasons and draw up the decree.

— At the last meeting of the Bengal British India Society.— One of the members of the Committee read the rules which have been prepared to guide the future operations of the Society. After the rules had been read, Mr. Speedy proposed that since they were consistent with the original principles on which the Society was founded, they should be at once adopted. This was not however concurred in by the majority present; and Mr. Michael Crow in particular, who proposed an amendment, that the consideration of the rules should be postponed, which being put in the vote was carried.

THURSDAY, MAY 9.

—The San arrival of the Bishop of Calcutta today to be a source of much joy. His Lordship left Bombay nearly five weeks ago, and the vessel we fully due on the 22d of last month. The principal reason has been remarkable for its storm, but they may not have extended to the Bay.

—The last number of the Christian Observer states, that the amount of offerings made to the Southey Gates on their way to Agra, amounted to 2000 Rupees and that this sum had been carried to the credit of the public funds.

—The Atlantic Steamer, which was to leave Bombay on the 1st of the present month, has 3000 passengers, 8 children and 4 servants. If Bombay can furnish a constant supply of passengers for the monthly steamer, it would be strange if Calcutta, Madras, Ceylon, the Straits and China should not be able to contribute a full complement of passengers month by month for the vessels of Peninsular and Oriental Company.

—The Star, in continuation of the return of Coolies shipped to the Mauritius, has published a list of those who have embarked in the month of April. They amount to 209 men, 60 women, and 15 children. The proportion of women is still within 12 per cent. It is added in the column of remarks that these vessels had cleared out before Mr. Davidson's letter relative to the disengagement was received. We are sorry that the names of the agents have been omitted; we believe it is accidental; but it would be well to supply the omission in future.

—The Swedish Steamer has arrived at Bombay from Kutch with the wounded, sixty in number. The larger proportion of them are doing well, though their wounds were in many instances severe; one man had his liver shot through, another his lung, another his gut. Two had died on their voyage. The Steamer which conveyed the wounded from Hyderabad to Kutch, was fired upon by the Baluchas from behind light breast works.

—The Bombay Times, from whose columns this information is derived, says, that the three officers who galloped along the whole front of the cannon line in the last battle, with the view of ascertaining its strength and drawing on themselves the fire of the guns and matchlocks, were Major Wellington and Lieuts. Brown and Hill.

—The Fleet and Messes, war steamers, now on their way to Bombay to strengthen the steam fleet on the Indus, are to proceed through the Pamban passage. They will then have two live shot ships days, which would otherwise have been lost in rounding Ceylon.

—We regret to learn from the Agra Ushier, that Col. Buchanan has sustained some severe injury in his head either from a fall off his horse or a coup de soleil.

—The Court of Requests has just ruled that its attorneys are entitled to a fee of Eight Rupees for every attendance on a client.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 10.

—The Gold Medal sent out by the Court of Directors for Dwaraknath Tagore is probably to be presented to him this morning at Government House by the Deputy Governor. We expect there will be a good gathering of Europeans and Natives on the occasion. The Heralds of this morning endeavor to show that the measure did not spring from their own "free will and mere whim;" and that they never thought of it till after Dwaraknath had received marks of distinguished honour from the nobility and the Court. There is some truth in what our contemporary says; but he is rather too severe on the Directors. We never to forget that in showing their good pleasure in not less than them, they have exhibited kindness of words second only to that of having set a good example themselves.

—The mortality in H. M. 631 by cholera to the soldiers of their march to Bellary as announced in the Madras papers received this morning is most distressing. In a very few days two of the officers, one lady, 100 men and five, and 2000 sick followers, besides women and children, have been carried to the grave.

—There was a paragraph in yesterday's Register, stating that Mr. Lang, the barrister, was to succeed Mr. O'Hanlon on the Magisterial Bench. The Star contradicts the report. The new Magistrate, if a barrister, must give up both chamber and forensic practice; and this it seems no gentleman is willing to do. We wish Government would manifest the same anxiety to have the whole man for the Education Secretary, which they do to have the whole man and nothing less for a Magistrate.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

THE MEETING IN HONOUR OF THE LATE SIR W. H. MACGREGOR.

The meeting last evening in honour of the late Sir W. H. Macgregor, was one of the most respectably attended there has been for a long time. A number of gentlemen belonging to the Civil and Military Services were present on the occasion, together with several others. Among the rest we observed R. B. Rattray, G. H. Bower, P. J. Halliday, J. F. M. Reid, H. Moore, R. Mytton, J. H. Patton, C. H. Prinspie, L. L. Clarke, W. H. Smolett, K. O'Dowda, W. C. Blayney, P. O'Hanlon, Esquires; Col. Forbes, Major Irving, Captain Lawrence, Dr. R. M. Thomson, Baboo Dwaraknath Tagore, Fromcomcomar Tagore, &c. &c. The Rev. Mr. Fisher, senior, was called to the chair, who opened the meeting with a very few words, when

Mr. RATTRAY rose to propose the first resolution, in doing which he addressed the meeting as follows:—

GENTLEMEN.—I will not weaken the impression of the moment by my feeble eulogy of a character, the merits of which you all know, and by your presence now acknowledge. I may be permitted, however, to state, that I was for some years officially connected with Sir William Macgregor, whose as its Register, he was attached to the Court to which I still belong; and that, even then, in a situation of much labor and responsibility, though little calculated to attract public attention, and still less to elicit public honors, he established for himself a high reputation, and found time to frame those volumes on the laws and usages of the country, which will long remain what they have long continued to be, the safe guide of our judicial functionaries. While there, as elsewhere, his talents and acquisitions were, by all, recognized and admired; and his kind and gentlemanly bearing was cordially responded to. Those talents and those acquisitions removed him to a higher grade of service; and the more extended display of them, there, eventually raised him to that eminence, which had he never attained, would not have been assembled here to mourn and honour him.

I beg to submit for your consideration, and, if approved, for your adoption, what I deem to be a suitable leading resolution on this most interesting occasion. Without some knowledge of the probable means, which men of good will and liberality may place at our disposal, it would seem difficult to determine the nature of the tribute most fitting to be offered to the memory of our departed friend; but whatever those means may become, I would suggest that, with reference to the tragic close of his earthly career, a eulogistic in the chief ecclesiastical office of our city, were the most appropriate memorial of his worth and of our appreciation of it. It may be in the form of a simple tablet or an imposing monument, as the result of our wisest men's judgment; for either we shall have choice of site in the new Cathedral; and I nothing doubt that we shall be enabled to render the record of our feelings towards our lamented friend, worthy of him and of the structure that shall enshrine him. It is the resolution, as our first resolution, that a eulogistic be erected to the memory of Sir William Macgregor, in the new Cathedral, and of the inscription that shall enshrine it, that we deem and respect which is the object of this meeting to manifest.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Brier, of the Civil Service, and unanimously carried. That as many friends of the deceased, both in this country and in England, will be desirous of uniting in the tribute, a committee be appointed to adopt such measures as may be necessary for collecting subscriptions, and preparing a suitable inscription, to be transmitted to a committee of subscribers in England, together with an amount to be realized in this country, with a request that they will send the necessary directions for the execution of the monument in communication with the family of the deceased."

And that the following gentlemen be requested to form the committee in Calcutta, with power to add to their number:—

MR. RATTRAY, MR. GREENLAKE, MR. BARNES, MR. HANCOCK, MR. TOWNSEND, MAJOR INLIVE.

And the following to act as the committee in England:—

MR. J. W. HOOK, CAPT. LAWRENCE.

MR. CLARKE then came forward to propose that Mr. Rattray should be asked to prepare the inscription, as he, Mr. Clarke, was assured, there was not another who could better do it than Mr. Rattray.

This was carried by acclamation. Mr. Rattray returned thanks for the honor, and pronounced his best to deserve the confidence placed in him.

The meeting broke up with the usual vote of thanks to the Chair.—Herald, May 3.

RELIGIOUS.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—It is rumored that Mr. Natt, the late Vicar of St. Sepulchre's, left to the Church Missionary Society by his will, an immediate legacy of 6,000*l.*, besides a reversionary one of smaller amount. We add, that the Corporation of London did themselves honour by voting, on Thursday last, the sum of Five Hundred pounds to this Society.—Record.

The Bishop of Antigua, in a sermon preached last week, at St. Clement's, Dares, on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, stated that it was the intention of the Society to send missionaries to China without delay, and at so distant period a bishop.—Ibid.

THE PROPAGATION SOCIETY.—We give from the Antiquarian paper the following notice:

Addressed by the Rev. W. M. Kinsey, B. D., Secretary to the Chesham Diocesan Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, in a paper read at the Secretary of the Parent Committee, 79, Pall Mall, London.

"Monday, February 6, 1848.
"3, Wellington-street, Chesham.
"Sir.—In consequence of the dissent of his words, (uttered at our District Propagation of the Gospel Meeting here, on the 10th of November last), now insisted upon by Mr. Campbell, and of the dissent of the Board, as to our Ecclesiastical, I beg of you to state, at the next Monthly Meeting of the Board, that, consistently with the declaration made in one of my letters to Mr. Campbell, I have this day resigned the Secretaryship of the District Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, in which I was appointed in the year 1833, now, of course, six years since.

"I remain, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"To the Secretary, &c. &c."
"W. M. KINSEY.
"79, Pall Mall, London."

But we hear that Mr. Kinsey is not the only one who has the most important resignation that will follow from the Campbell and Close correspondence.—Ibid.

We have heard, and we trust that the report mined at 6d.-lb. The price now is 14s. The estimate for the United States will range from 2,000,000 bales to 2,500,000; 1,070,000, of which are already been received into the ports; and yet, notwithstanding this heavy receipt, the market is now shown as an average of 300,000 bales (292,000) only sold in 1842) over last year, with every man at work, and an increased consumption of near 2,000 bales per week. The general state of the cotton speculation, last year, was not very satisfactory, and we are now in a position to see any good reason to justify a further depression in price. Low as prices are in the United States, the price of the staple cotton in this country is now selling at an average 1 cent. per lb., fully 16 per cent. below the price which was written there has been a vast improvement in point of business in the Liverpool market. Speculation has been active, and the sales have been an improvement of 2 to 3 per cent. above last week's price. The Manchester market continues to exhibit some marks of increased demand, which were manifested during the preceding week, and which have already done much to remove despondency. The demand for goods has been considerable for some days past, and a fair amount of business has been done, but without any sensible advance of price in any article; and, generally, at a more shade above the level of some of last year. In yarns, also, especially in the description suitable to the present season, a tolerable amount of business has been done. At Rochdale, however, they report an extremely bad market, and surely any business between Manchester and Rochdale is well worth nothing at all has been doing, and the sellers are eager to sell at reduced rates. In Paisley, work continues gradually to get more abundant. Between the mills that have been obtained from Glasgow, and the improvement in the domestic trade of the town, with very few exceptions, all the wares which have hitherto been necessary mountings are enabled to obtain work for sale. We regret to hear that the stagnation in trade continues to not meet injuriously on the revenue. It was fully expected that at the opening of the new year there would have been some improvement; but we are again doomed to be disappointed, and are now informed that the revenue from the Customs in the forthcoming quarter will be, if possible, more than the last.

At Leeds, business continues at all improve in the cloth market: last Tuesday's market was the worst ever witnessed. In the warehouse business is extremely dull, and at no time has there been any preparation of goods for the spring demand. Hosiery-dress market shows no change for the better. Woollen are dull of sale, but no downward tendency in price. At Bradford, in plain goods a steady business is doing, and last prices maintained. During this week there has been a little more inquiry for yarns, chiefly in the shipping houses. The staple trades of Nottingham have been practically sinking into a gloom, and have retarded all persons engaged in trade or manufactures. The worst spinning mills in Leicester are generally going, but there is a visible decline, and all interests seem much depressed. — Examiner, Feb. 25.

ADVERTISEMENT.—The following advertisement taken from the Times, may perhaps suit the taste of some of our Eusebian opponents, who are so busy in expurgating what cannot wholly be contrived, to meet the occasional indiscretion of our advertising friends. "Wanted, a Catholic youth, who can take care of, and safely drive, a pair of horses. Apply, Esq., Sidney Street, in his early articles in the Edinburgh Review, used to make himself very merry with the advertisement of the late Mr. Justice Dore, of DePuy, who was said to have advertised to the Edinburgh Magazine, for a stout, young man, who could carry so many hundred weight, we forget the quantity, but it was so great as to induce the anonymous divine to say that it was sufficient to make any man serious." — Record.

CANDIDATE.—In a trial in the Court of Common Pleas last week, when Captain Curry met Sir Robert Peel for money lost in play. The defendant's plea was that the money was not unfairly. Among the witnesses, Lord Huntingtower was called, and was the telling evidence. He was asked, "Did you see the plaintiff made you a proposal so dishonourable, as to put you, as a man of honour, under his knife to leave your home?" Lord Huntingtower—No. "Where did you see him?" Lord Huntingtower—No. "Did he afterwards say to you anything?" Lord Huntingtower—No. "The jury returned a verdict for the defendant." — Idid.

REVENUE OF LORD BACCHAM'S CHURCH.—A considerable number of members of the church, at Norwood, held under Croydon Church, was, prior to the passing of the Act, but at 5s. an acre; it is now let to the Duke of Portland at 7s. an acre. — Idid.

THE GOVERNMENT EDUCATION SCHEME.—Sir James Graham's intended Bill is, for the present, a purely educational Bill, for the purpose of children, to be known as the Factory Children's Bill; although others are to be permitted to attend.

For the instruction of Factory Children, the following scheme is proposed:—

1. That public schools shall be established in the district schools, to be established in the Metropolitan and in the manufacturing districts.
2. That such schools shall receive all children under seven years of age chargeable to the parish or union of the district; and that the education of others be permitted.
3. That such schools shall be built out of the proceeds, and be managed by the trustees of the school, with consent of the Bishop, who shall regulate and superintend the religious instruction.
4. That a Chaplain be appointed to each school, with consent of the Bishop, who shall regulate and superintend the religious instruction.
5. That the Minister shall be allowed to attend and give instruction to children whose parents or guardians object, on religious grounds, to the Liturgy and Catechism of the Church of England.
6. All rules and regulations for instruction and training to be made with consent of the Committee of Council on Education.
7. The schools to be visited by the Government Inspector, and on the representation of the Committee of Council, teachers declared incompetent to be dismissed.

In reference to Factory schools, it is proposed:—

1. That one-third of the expense of building shall be raised by voluntary subscription; a second-third to be granted out of the public fund; and the remainder to be paid by the Government and repaid out of the poor-rates. But no grant or loan is to be made, unless the Justices of the division shall declare such a school to be necessary.
2. That each child shall pay 3d. a week, the same to be stopped out of its wages by the master. The remaining cost of the school to be paid out of the poor-rates.
3. That the Justices for three schools are to be formed by the Committee of Council on Education.
4. These schools are to be governed by Trustees, consisting of seven individuals, six of the members of the division, and one to be chosen by this clerical trustee; and the remaining four are to be appointed by the Justices in special session. The trustees to appoint the master, subject to the approval of the clerical trustee.

No child is to be instructed in the Catechism and Liturgy of the Church of England, whose parents object to it on religious grounds. The children of Church of England parents are to be instructed in the Catechism daily, but separate from the other children; or, if not separated, the instruction is to be limited to two hours on certain days in the week.

The schools are to be inspected daily by the clerical trustee. Divine worship is to be conducted in the school by the clerical trustee, or by any one whom he may appoint, on Sunday, Christmas-day, Good Friday, and on the usual fasts and festivals which may be school holidays. On the production of proper certificates, no child is to be required to attend any service which is not of a religious nature, or any other service.

FRANCE.—The Paris Journals of Sunday are much excited by the civic division in the bureau on the preceding day, in consequence of which the Minister had but few commissioners and the Opposition found in the commission of the Address the Ministry had right and the Opposition one. The coalition is, in fact, determined on making a serious trial of strength; and the Journal admits that against the Conservatives voted against M. Guizot. Nevertheless, it calculates that the collected Opposition mustered but 193 votes, the Ministry 211. We have learned, from good judges, on this matter, that there were 210 Opposition votes in the French Chamber, where they all mustered; but the Ministers have from 10 to 20 more.

FRANCE.—The Minister of Agriculture and Commerce has published the returns of the imports and export of corn into and from France during the year 1842, from which it appears that the wheat imported amounted to 412,171 metric quintals; other grain, to 153,007; and flour, to 4,746. The exports were, wheat, 371,423 metric quintals; other grain, 232,867; flour, 58,211. There remained in the stores, on the 1st of January last, wheat, 767,028 metric quintals; other grain, 24,539; and flour, 19,244. — Record.

FRANCE AND THE MARSHES.—About 8,000 men assembled last week in Paris, about the Hotel of the Marston, in the hope of obtaining employment in the new colony of the Marston. The answer returned to their application is said to have been, nothing had been decided. — Examiner.

SWITZERLAND.—There has been an attempt at revolution in Geneva. The Government of that town are deeply discontented that the reform of the constitution and electoral law, effected last year, has not produced all the results hoped for. They find the Grand Council elected since the reform, just as they are the old one, and as obstinate to defend abuses. A municipal law was in discussion; the people took great interest in it, and were annoyed to find that the Government were able to carry their spite against the Radicals. On the 15th, accordingly, the crowd around the place of assembly cried, to arms, while the Government summoned the National Guard by the sound of the church bell. The insurgents took post in the suburbs of St. Germain. By this means they got possession of the two gates, Coarve and Rivet. But they were driven from about the Hotel de Ville, and in an attack on the powder magazine, about a dozen citizens were wounded or killed. Amongst the latter are Major Fournier and Councilor Fath.

The Grand Council persevered in voting one of the obnoxious laws, that respecting the Council of State; the insurgents sent a deputation, asking that it should be annulled; the Grand Council and the Government would grant nothing, until they carry their spite against the Radicals. By the last accounts the demands had subsided.

The Gazette of Geneva of the 18th last, publishes the list of the persons killed and wounded on the 15th and 16th. Only four have been killed, and the others did not exceed 30. The city was then tranquil. — Idid.

ROMA AND RUSSIA.—The Aspurgian Gazette contains the following account of the appointment of M. Vencovski in agent to the Court of Russia, to arrange the existing differences between the two Courts. — Idid.

THE REPUBLIC OF PARAGUAY.—The English Government has been alarmed at some time of establishing diplomatic and commercial relations with this country, which, since the death of Dr. Francia, has become a Republic, governed by five Councils. These officers appeared most of our countrymen, as several British merchants who have entered the country have been well received, as well as Mr. Gordon, who is so anxious to see the Republic flourish. We learn, however, that a serious and serious difficulty has sprung up recently, and that Mr. Gordon has been ordered to leave the country. The cause of this difference we have been unable to learn. — Liverpool Times.

DWARAKNATH TAGORE.—A very numerous and highly respectable company of Europeans and Natives assembled at Government House on Wednesday week to witness the presentation of the gold medal which the Court of Directors have sent out for Dwarkanath Tagore. The Deputy Governor's address, and Dwarkanath's reply,—both of which will be found among our communications—were very appropriate. His Honour dealt with much felicity on the proof thus afforded by the Court of Directors of their anxiety to encourage and reward the meritorious exertions of Natives in the cause of public benevolence, and we are confident his observations will carry much weight with the sound and enlightened portion of the Native community, and serve to counteract those wild denunciations of the British Government in the East, which have lately been the order of the day.
